

2022 NFL Draft Guide

Once again draft season is upon us, and with that comes my Top 100 prospects. This list contains 150+ hours of scouting, with multiple games of film watched on each prospect. Positional value is weighted slightly, with Quarterbacks and Runningbacks affected the heaviest. Below are 100 player rankings, write-ups for each, positional rankings, strengths, weaknesses and an overall draft grade. Quarterbacks have been assigned a player comparison that is based on play style and not a career projection. There is an honorable mention section at the end for the players who nearly missed the cut.

I hope you enjoy the read, and I welcome all comments on the bottom.

–Mister Irrelevant misterirrelevant.org

Note: RAS scores were used for many prospects in order to help quantify athleticism. RAS takes all the measurables and testing at the combine, compares it to every other player at the position and gives a score out of ten. Example: A 70% athlete receives a 7.0 RAS.

Top 100 Prospects

1. Aidan Hutchinson

Michigan – Edge #1

The top ranked player in the 2022 draft class, Aidan Hutchinson was the most dominant defender in college football. Hutch was a back end first rounder following his junior year, before exploding onto the national stage as a senior. Hutchinson wins with his insane get off, which is easily the best in the class. He is explosive from the get go, and converts it into power. His go-to move is his bull rush, which he consistently used to plow through linemen. Hutch has speed in his rush that he combines with pass rush moves. His swim move was successful, and he was able to get under lineman and win leverage battles. He is able to piece together pass sets and counters.

The most outstanding piece of Hutchinson's game may be his motor, and no player is more determined and relentless as a pass rusher. He is violent and will do anything in his control to win on every down. In the biggest rivalry game of the season, Aidan Hutchinson completely took over vs Ohio State. There was nothing that could be done to stop him, and Hutch nearly single handedly won them the game on defense. His year to year improvement is a reflection of his work ethic that coaches will fall in love with.

While Hutch is extremely pro ready, he lacks the insane ceiling that number one prospects generally have. He has short 32" arms, and doesn't win around the edge as successfully as you'd like to see. It took Hutch's senior year to dominate and doesn't have a ton of room to grow as a rusher. Kayvon Thibodeaux has more potential than Hutch, but lacks the insane polish and pure power that Hutchinson possesses. The 2022 class lacks the star power of former years, and Aidan isn't the homerun pick that the first pick usually is. However, Hutchinson will be an extremely effective pass rusher as a rookie, who will produce as a pro bowler throughout his career.

Strengths:

Get Off

Power Rush

Swim Move

Takeover Ability

Motor
Work Ethic
Explosive

Weaknesses:

Arm Length
Senior
Lacks the Ceiling of a Top 5 Edge Consistently Winning The Edge

Grade: Top Five

2. Kayvon Thibodeaux

Oregon – Edge #2

The number one player out of high school, Kayvon Thibodeaux has garnered attention since he stepped on the football field. Kayvon may have never taken over college football, but he produced three stellar seasons at Oregon. From destroying first rounder Alijah Vera-Tucker as a rookie, to dominating California year after year, Thibs has had no shortage of highlight reel events. Just by looking at Kayvon, it's easy to notice his All-Pro potential. He has a crazy lengthy frame offering ideal length on the edge. His athleticism is unmatched in the class, with high end explosiveness and burst. His ability to convert speed to power is extraordinary, with plays of him completely knocking lineman over. Kayvon's first step and unreal bend allow him to win the edge against athletic blockers. Kayvon can drop into coverage, but is primarily a complete rusher on the edge who can influence the run game as well. He was often either double teamed or assigned a chip blocker.

Kayvon's flaws come in his inconsistency and pass rush plan. He relied too much on pure athleticism to win, and while it did oftentimes work in college it will be extremely different in the NFL. Kayvon rarely used his hands, and when he did he would attack at a high pad level. There are many reps where Kayvon simply ran headfirst into lineman and was stonewalled. He doesn't piece together pass rush moves at a level that will consistently succeed in the NFL. His traits alone gives him a floor as a pass rusher, but he lacks the pass rush skill of Aidan Hutchinson. In order to reach his ceiling, Kayvon must devote his time to improving his hands and moves. Recently, Kayvon has been circulating the media for his lack of effort and coachability. Teams are nervous that he is another elite talent that doesn't put in the work, and is more focused on fame and his brand over improving his game. He's received many comparisons to Jadeveon Clowney, another uber talented prospect who struggled to fit on teams and improve as a rusher.

While there's no way for me to truly know, I think that many of these newfound concerns with Kayvon are just a natural part of the pre-draft process. He has the talent to be a true #1 pass rusher who puts up 10+ sack seasons on a year to year basis. While Kayvon doesn't have the sureness of a number one pick, he has the tools to justify himself as a top selection in the draft. Kayvon profiles as a productive year one pass rusher with potential to be a top five Edge Rusher in the NFL.

Strengths:

Frame

Bend

Traits

Get Off and Explosiveness

Speed to Power

High End Ability

Weaknesses:

Pass Rush Plan

Hand Usage

Consistency

Potential Character Concerns

Grade: Top Five

3. Evan Neal

Alabama – OT #1

Evan Neal stands at a ginormous 6'8" 345 lbs. You wouldn't guess that from looking at him, as Neal carries his weight like Tight End. He's a freak who won't be beat athletically. His release is explosive, and can be left on an island in the passing game. His balance needs work and his hand usage isn't perfect, but Neal's technique is polished enough for a man of his size who will continue to improve. He can get to the second level and block in the run game, but his best plays are in normal pass sets. Neal occasionally is beaten off stunt rushes, and needs to improve in identifying rushers. He isn't a mauler, and tends to stand his ground. He can rotate between any position on the offensive line. Neal isn't as pro ready as Rashawn Slater was last year, and will have his struggles as a rookie. Most of his issues are fixable, and he will be a force on the offensive line for years to come. Evan Neal profiles as a cornerstone Left Tackle, who could start out on the right side as he develops his game.

Strengths:

Athleticism

Release

Frame

Versatility

Weaknesses:

Balance

Passive at Times

Identifying Blitzers

Grade: Top Five

4. Ikem Ekwonu

NC State – OT #2

Ekwonu is a compact 6'4 310, and uses his power on every play. The top run blocker in the nation, Ekwonu gets to the second level and finishes blocks. At heart Ekwonu is a mauler, and will completely shove defenders off the screen. He received the highest run block grade ever this year, and received the third highest grade as a sophomore. He locks on well, and has a strong base. He shuts down most power rushers, but still struggles against speed. His pass sets need more polish and his footwork is far from perfect. There are plenty of reps that show Ekwonu crossing his feet, and he has room to grow from a technical standpoint. His issues are fixable, and are common for young offensive linemen.

If Ekwonu faces problems on the outside, he will have no issue kicking to guard and instantly becoming one of the elites in the league. However, you draft lineman in the top five to play tackle, and Ekwonu has the abilities to do so. He is already a stud run blocker, and has the physicality and athleticism to grow in the passing game. Ekwonu is less pro ready than Evan Neal, but offers slightly higher upside. If he can get with the proper coaching, Ekwonu will be a force to be reckoned with. He should be drafted to either a power or zone heavy running team.

Strengths:

Mauler

Size

Run Blocking Base

Weaknesses:

Speed Rushers
Footwork
Pass Sets

Grade: Top Five

5. Kyle Hamilton

Notre Dame – S #1

Kyle Hamilton is a different breed at the Safety position. His build is like nobody else, standing at 6'4" 220 lbs with 33" arms. Kyle's length alone makes him an intriguing Safety prospect, but that's only the beginning of his game. He was designed in a lab to guard Tight Ends, and has the physicality to match up with them. Hamilton has elite ball skills and can compete against any receiver at the catch point. He is rangy and can play sideline to sideline. His radius of influence is impressive for a Safety, and he can cover large areas on the field. Hamilton wins with his instincts. He knows when to jump routes, and is an extremely fast processor. Hamilton attacks the ball and is elite in pursuit. He reads offensive plays and makes a sharp line drive to the ball. He primarily played in the slot, but took snaps deep and as a box Safety.

Hamilton is a playmaker who involves himself in every play. He's a leader you want at the back of a defense. Hamilton's hips aren't extremely fluid, and his change of direction is slowed down by his big frame. While he was tracked at running 21 MPH this year during a game, Hamilton recorded a surprisingly slow 4.59 40 at the Combine. His change of direction testing was mediocre, but he jumped nearly eleven feet in the broad jump. Hamilton's lack of short area movement skills limits him in man coverage. He won't be able to guard quick receivers one on one, lowering his value as an all around player. Similar to former unicorn prospect Isaiah Simmons, coaches may struggle to maximize Hamilton's talent. He should be moved around between guarding Tight Ends, playing deep coverage, and sticking on Tight Ends. The role of a Safety is devalued in the NFL, especially without elite man coverage skills. However, Hamilton has the traits, aggression and next level instincts to thrive as a high end safety.

Strengths:

Length

Physicality

Ball Skills

Instincts

Ability to Guard Tight Ends

Playmaker

Run Defense

Rangy

Weaknesses:

Change of Direction

Movement Skills

Man Coverage

Position Value

Harder to Maximize

Grade: Top Seven

6. Travon Walker

Georgia– Edge #3

The biggest winner of the 2022 NFL combine, Travon Walker displayed his outstanding athleticism. Showing up at 6'5 270, Walker ran a superhuman 4.51 40, and a 6.89 three cone, testing as a 99.9% athlete (9.99). Walker has the potential to be great, but his game is far from complete. He's a powerful rusher who uses his arm length to gain leverage. Walker didn't display many moves or hand usage at Georgia, and was relatively on the stat sheet. Playing both inside and outside, Walker had a tendency to get sucked into blocks, unable to counter pass block moves. He wasn't as productive as elite prospects should be, and may not be a day one pass rusher. Due to Georgia's stacked defense, Walker was primarily used as a run stuffer, and occasionally dropped back into coverage. Walker is an instant impact player in the run game, but a top-10 talent needs to be able to win in the passing game. Whichever team drafts Walker is getting a low floor player with an unlimited ceiling. If Walker can build pass rush technique he will be a stud. If not, play him on the interior as a high motor run stopper.

Strengths:

Athletic Traits

Motor

Run Defense

Versatility

Weaknesses:

College Production

Pass Rush Technique

Grade: Top Seven

7. Charles Cross

Mississippi State – OT #3

Cross skyrocketed up big boards this year at Mississippi State. His pass blocking technique is the best in the class, and offers an immediate floor. Cross thrives against power rushers, and sucks them in with his long arms. He has proven his worth ethic, heavily improving each year. Despite his big frame, Cross quickly gets into pass sets. He was consistent this year against top competition, and played extremely well against Alabama. In the run game Cross isn't a liability, but needs to become an enforcer and push defenders back. There isn't much tape of him blocking speed rushers, and he may struggle against them as a rookie. Cross is one of the safest prospects in the draft, and has the technique of an NFL starter. The biggest thing holding Cross back is his elite athletic upside. He ran well at the combine, but isn't an athletic freak like Evan Neal, or a mover like Ickey Ekwonu. NFL teams know what they are getting with Cross, and that's a starting left tackle immediately. He may never be a top player in his position, but is a long term starter on the offensive line.

Strengths:

Pass Sets

Base

Year to Year Improvement

Success against top Competition

Weaknesses:

Enforcing Elite Upside

Grade: Top Ten

8. Ahmad Gardner

Cincinnati – CB #1

The best corner in college football this year, “Sauce” was a true shutdown player. He didn’t allow a single touchdown all season, and teams mostly decided to not throw his way. Gardner has extremely long 33.5” inch arms, and uses his length to thrive in press-man coverage. He has fluid hips and can change direction at will. While he ran a 4.41 at the combine, he lacks the true high end speed that elite corner prospects have. His level of competition at Cincinnati was weak, but he fared well in his game against Alabama. He uses his length to stay with receivers and break up passes, and he may get called for penalties in the NFL. Gardner didn’t play many reps in zone coverage, but he has the tools to master it at the next level. His biggest concern is his bulk, coming in at 6’3 190. His slender build is evident in the run, where he struggles to get off blocks. Gardner is a day one starting corner, and can become one of the top secondary players in the league.

Strengths:

Length
Profilic in Man - 0 Tds Allowed Fluid Hips Sticky in Coverage
Ball skills

Weaknesses:

Holding Penalties

Tackling Due to Frame
Run Defense
Level of Competition

Grade: Top Twelve

9. Derek Stingley Jr.

LSU – CB #2

Derek Stingley freshman year was arguably the greatest season by a college corner in football history. He was completely lockdown as an island corner, shutting down multiple NFL receivers. Stingley showed everything you want in a Cornerback. His movement skills and fluidity were tremendous, he played with physicality and aggression, and his ball skills were outstanding. Stingley had six interceptions that season while only allowing 37% of passes. He could man up any Wide Receiver and match them athletically.

Following their historic 2019 championship, LSU's program took a downturn, with Stingley following in their path. With LSU no longer a competitive program, Stingley started playing with less fire. His effort wasn't completely there, and his reps were less consistent. His tackling was subpar, and Stingley was seemingly cruising through his Sophomore and Junior years. Stingley also dealt with injuries, missing time in 2020, then suffering a Lisfranc injury and not finishing the 2021 season. His zone coverage is not his strong point, and Stingley is best used in press man. Stingley had a promising pro day while recovering from Lisfranc, reinforcing his freaky traits.

Most of Stingley's stock resides on his ability to return to 2019 form. His demeanor the last two seasons and his injury status are concerning, and drop him behind Ahmad Gardner. Stingley has the highest ceiling in the class, and can potentially be a true island Cornerback in the NFL. Stingley profiles as a press-man corner who has all the tools to succeed in the NFL.

Strengths:

Athleticism
Fluid
Press Ability
Ball Skills

Weaknesses:

Injury History
Tackling Downward Trend
Effort Concerns

Grade: Top Twelve

10. Devin Lloyd

Utah – LB #1

Devin Lloyd was a prototypical linebacker this year at Utah. The captain of the defense, Lloyd filled virtually every role needed. He thrives in pass coverage, and can read modern offenses. His football IQ is obvious, and he knows when to attack the ball or sit back. With seemingly infinite energy chasing the ball, Lloyd takes great angles and wraps up ball carriers. He is skinny (237), and won't bull rush through offensive linemen, but Lloyd makes up for it with his downhill speed. His athleticism isn't a liability, but he doesn't possess the superhuman strength or quickness of elite linebacker prospects. His balance is elite and his change of direction allows him to switch between receivers in zone coverage. Lloyd could be the safest player in the class, with no glaring holes to attack. I compared him to All-Pro Fred Warner, an all around linebacker who excels in coverage. Lloyd is a day one middle linebacker, who should be an impact player immediately.

Strengths:

Complete Game

Pursuit

Change of Direction

Weaknesses:

Frame

Game-Changing Athleticism

Grade: Top Fifteen

11. Kenyon Green

Texas A&M – IOL #1

Kenyon Green may be the draft's most versatile player, playing all across the line in his collegiate career. Green is most suited to play guard, but has the ability to play tackle as well. His footwork is solid, to go along with a natural feel for space. He has a strong anchor, both at tackle and at guard. Green's play at Texas A&M was inconsistent, due to his constant change of position, and teams should mold him to a specific position. He can struggle in the run game, especially in downfield blocks. His testing at the combine was mediocre, and is a bit concerning for a first round player. Throughout his career at Texas A&M, Green displayed the ability to win pass rush sets against top talent. He fits best into a spread offense or power run scheme. Overall, Kenyon Green has a versatile skill set, and should be a cornerstone guard at the next level.

Strengths:

Versatile – Should be molded to a position
Anchor Pass Blocking

Weaknesses:

Open Field Blocks
Zone Run Blocking Double Team help

Grade: Top Fifteen

12. Jermaine Johnson

Florida State – Edge #4

The biggest riser of the pre-draft process, Johnson has risen up the first round. Jermaine spent two years in JUCO, transferred to Georgia, then finally ended up at Florida State where he hoped to get a bigger role. He was uber productive this year, recording 14 sacks and playing an insane amount of snaps. The first thing that pops about Johnson's game is his run defense. He gets off blocks and uses his strong frame to tackle running backs. Johnson is a hard worker and has a high motor, tallying up sacks on second effort plays. Even when losing reps, Jermaine manages to stay in the play and circle around the ball. He has successful pass rush moves in his arsenal, but none that are truly deadly. Johnson wasn't able to crack Georgia's rotation, which is concerning for a first round talent. There's no concerns about his floor, as Jermaine might lack the high end traits of a top prospect. He lacks a high end skill or ability in the pass game to consistently win reps, and he was often stood up. He is athletic and has bend, but lacks the "freaky traits" of a Travon Walker or Kayvon Thibodeaux. Jermaine is already 23, adding another question about his ceiling.

Johnson flew down to Mobile for the Senior Bowl, only to leave halfway through. It wasn't due to injury, it was because Jermaine spent his time bullying every offensive lineman. He put on a display, winning pass rush reps at will while looking like the best player on the field. Following his dominance, Johnson followed it up by performing well at the combine (9.23 RAS). His 4.56 40, and 10'5 broad jump put some questions about his athletic profile to rest. Johnson may not have the twitch or high end of other edge rushers, but he is a quality pass rusher and an elite run defender. His floor is an average pass rusher who has a high motor and impacts the run game. Jermaine Johnson can be a 10 sack a year player who affects every down.

Strengths:

Run Defense
Senior Bowl Showing
Bend
Strong Base
Motor

Weaknesses:

Older Prospect
Average Get-Off Elite Traits

Grade: Top Fifteen

13. Jordan Davis

Georgia – IDL #1

There may be no possible way to quantify the size of Jordan Davis. Even when standing next to college and pro athletes, Davis sticks out like a sore thumb. At a towering 6'4 340, Jordan Davis dwarfs even his fellow Georgian Devonte Wyatt. Davis manned the middle of Georgia's defense, and was a one man wrecking ball against the run. His massive frame alone makes him a threat to opposing running backs, and Davis successfully took on double team blocks. Surprisingly, Davis has the range and quickness to get to the outside and chase down run plays. Someone as large as he is should not be able to move that fast. Jordan Davis is currently a run stuffer, and lacks pass rush moves. He can collapse a pocket but has little technique when rushing the passer. He was used as a two down player, but he has the tools to improve against the pass. With his size comes his biggest concern: stamina. Seemingly so, Davis has a hard time staying on the field, and opposing teams would run hurry up, trying to keep Davis on the field for as long as possible. While most DT's play around 500ish snaps, Davis only played 375. He would tire quickly on the field, and only played run heavy downs. However, Georgia had an insanely stacked defensive line, and they had the opportunity to constantly rotate defenders.

Jordan Davis weighed in lighter than usual at the combine, a good sign for NFL scouts, and had arguably the greatest performance of all time. He started with running a 4.78 40, which was the fastest ever by a 300+ prospect. He then jumped 32" on the vertical, and 10'3 on the broad, numbers which match most Linebackers. His performance was already elite for a Defensive Tackle, not to mention the fact that he is one of the largest players in NFL history. Davis rightfully earned a 10 RAS, the greatest testing for a Defensive Tackle ever. His testing gives the hope that he can build his pass rush, becoming an unstoppable force in the NFL. Currently, Davis is an elite run defender, who only plays limited snaps. The goal for him is to improve his stamina, and ultimately tap into his superhuman athleticism and become a star.

Strengths:

Power

Never Seen Before Athleticism

Run Defense

Weaknesses:

Stamina

Pass Rush Arsenal

Limited Snaps at Georgia

Grade: Top Twenty

14. Trevor Penning

Northern Iowa – OT #4

Penning is a 6”7 340 pound athletic freak. He’s recorded a 625 pound squat, ran a 4.89 40, and landed a 9.96 RAS at the combine. The Northern Iowa tackle has a fast release, quickly getting into his stance. His calling card is his aggressiveness, and he uses his extreme power to flatten defenders at every opportunity. He’s a mauler who will win once locked onto a rusher. Penning has shown adequate pass blocking, but he can overextend his arms, and is occasionally beaten around the edge. His technique in the run game needs work, and he will get called for holding penalties his rookie year. His competition in college was subpar, but he displayed promising traits. Penning isn’t the high floor player the top three tackles prospects are, but he has all the tools to become an all-pro talent. Trevor Penning is a day one starting right tackle, who may struggle his rookie year, especially against speed rushers, and will hopefully be an eventual cornerstone LT.

Strengths:

Athletic Ceiling

Release

Sucking in Rushers

Solid Pass Sets

Weaknesses:

Competition
Vertical Run Blocking (screens) Overextends

Grade: Top 20

15. George Karlaftis

Purdue – Edge #5

One of the most productive rushers in college, Karlaftis was the star of Purdue's defense. Even while heavily double teamed, Karlaftis managed to take over games. He is a pure power rusher who wins with his elite lower body strength and burst off the line. Offensive linemen are wary of his power, and Karlaftis uses this to his advantage, faking bull rushes to gain leverage. Karlaftis lacks bend in his rush, and won't win around the edge. He isn't uber explosive, and didn't show elite explosiveness on tape. Karlaftis can get sucked into blocks, becoming a non factor in plays all together, which is concerning for a first round player. In the run game, Karlaftis can get pushed around, and lacks the speed to consistently make tackles. I compared him to A.J. Epenesa, as he can win with power, but his high end athletic traits are a concern. Karlaftis may never be an All-Pro edge rusher, but he has a high floor as a high motor power rusher, who can be a long term starter.

Strengths:

Elite power Burst
Bull Rush

Weaknesses:

Run Game

Bend

Elite Speed

Grade: Top Twenty

16. Garrett Wilson

Ohio State – WR #1

Garrett Wilson is the leader of Ohio State's talented receiving core. He was extremely productive all year, matching up against college football's best corners. Wilson has the best feel for football in the class. He can contort his body to make catches, and has great hands. Wilson runs slippery routes that are built upon his creativity. He offers YAC ability, ducking and weaving through defenders. Wilson is instinctual after the ball, knowing where everyone is on the field. His routes are often too flowery, and need to be simplified to cuts and breaks. Wilson is slender at 6'0 184 pounds. He will struggle to impose his will on Cornerbacks, who will be aggressive with him on the outside. Wilson should attempt to add muscle to his frame, which would solidify his X Receiver status. He is able to separate, and can be an every down receiver. Wilson ran a 4.39 40 at the Combine, proving that he can be used deep. I compared Garrett Wilson to CeeDee Lamb, two receivers who have great instincts and slithery YAC ability. He can step in and contribute as a middle of the field threat immediately. Wilson profiles as an high floor receiver with WR #1 abilities, especially if he can put on weight.

Strengths:

Instincts

YAC

Body Control

Hands

Weaknesses:

Frame

Overcomplicates Routes

Press

Grade: Top Fifteen

17. Zion Johnson

Boston College – IOL #2

A fifth year player, Zion played both guard and tackle for Boston College. He projects as a guard, but his 34" arms give him an opportunity for potential tackle play. Zion is short with a burly lower body build, perfect for guard. He knows how to find defenders, and finishes plays. Zion has a strong base, which he both uses to stand his ground and maul defenders in the run game. He offers a high floor as a guard, and should be a plug and play rookie. Zion showed up to the senior bowl and dominated, taking snaps at all five o-line positions. He didn't show elite traits on film, but proved himself at the combine, scoring a 9.73 RAS. Zion is an easy projection to the next level. Any team that needs a pure guard should draft him in the middle of the round. His positional ranking is his biggest downfall, but he's as safe a pick as it gets.

Strengths:

Mauler

Base

Drives Hips

Weaknesses:

Positional Value

5th Year Starter

Height

Grade: Middle First

18. Drake London

USC – WR #2

Drake London was easily the best receiver in college football this year. He is a target machine, racking up deep catches and highlights. London uses his 6'4 frame and 33" arms to highpoint catches above defenders. His contested catch skills were near unstoppable, catching balls while smothered by multiple defenders. Many contested catch receivers dominate in college only to bust in the NFL, failing to gain separation. London's game will naturally invite those questions, but he has a more well rounded game. He can run routes, and can win in the middle of the field. London uses his deep play ability to open up the back shoulder, where he uses his frame to box defenders out. London will still win at the catch point in the NFL, making him a red zone threat. He lacks high end speed and won't explode past defenders. He is a YAC threat who is creative with the ball in his hands. London can be the perfect security blanket for young Quarterbacks. He tore his ACL during the season, and opted not to test in the pre draft process. London can be lazy in his routes, allowing NFL Cornerbacks to smother him in coverage. While he won't take the top off a defense, London has the makings of a true X receiver. There are separation concerns, but London can win all over the field.

Strengths:

Contested Catches

Length

YAC

Possession Skills

Weaknesses:

Speed

Elite Separation

Grade: Top Twenty

19. Tyler Linderbaum

Iowa – IOL #3

Tyler Linderbaum was truly dominant at Center this year at Iowa. He has very few flaws in his film, attacking on all levels of the game. Linderbaum wrestled at Iowa, and took down All-Pro Tristan Wirfs. His athleticism is obvious on tape, where his explosiveness and movement skills are off the charts. Linderbaum is intelligent as a blocker, and will pick up on blitzers. He's a mover in the run game and enjoys hitting his opponents. Linderbaum's concerns are not about his tape, but rather his fit in the NFL. He's a pure center, and lacks the versatility of other elite interior prospects. Linderbaum played in a zone run scheme at Iowa, where he is best utilized, and will need to find a similar system in the NFL. He's far from a one size fits all prospect, and will have to find a specific scheme to truly unlock his talent. Linderbaum had an impressive Pro Day, but his arms were only measured at 31" (7%), which are complete outliers on the offensive line. His lack of length is a red flag, considering there are no lineman with smaller arms. He is undersized overall, and while he plays with power, Linderbaum may get smothered by larger interior rushers. Linderbaum is best used in a zone running scheme, where he can utilize his movement skills and technique to be a force in the run game. His size is a major concern, but Linderbaum has the skill to impress as a rookie. While his value is lowered as a Center only player, Linderbaum can be one of the top in his position sooner than later.

Strengths:

Athleticism

Technique

Intelligence

Weaknesses:

Arm Length

Size

Versatility

Scheme Dependent

Grade: Middle First

20. Malik Willis

Liberty – QB #1

Malik Willis has assumed the yearly role of the small school development Quarterback. Willis transferred from Auburn before filling the stat sheet at Liberty the last two seasons. The first thing that pops off his tape are his legs. Willis is an extremely talented runner, with both the speed and power to break tackles. He's dangerous as a ball carrier and will force teams to focus on his running ability. Along with Malik's dangerous scrambling ability is his rocket arm. Willis has the strongest arm in the class, and makes some NFL worthy throws that most Quarterbacks can only dream of. He throws with crazy zip and has the arm talent to make any throw on the field. Willis has uncoachable talent, but he's also the least pro ready Quarterback in the class. His throwing mechanics are a mess, leaning into the throw and swinging his back leg. His accuracy is inconsistent, and while sometimes Willis completes astonishing passes, he can also miss throws altogether. He is interception prone and can make poor decisions with the ball.

While Malik's legs make him a dangerous dual threat, it also helped form his greatest weakness. Malik's habits in the pocket are outright horrendous. He holds onto the ball for way too long, and tends to play hero ball behind the line of scrimmage. Malik takes too many sacks and needs to simply go through his reads and get rid of the ball. His pocket instincts are a mess, but some of that can be attributed to his awful O-Line. Malik was forced to survive on his legs, and won't have to play hero ball in the NFL. He needs some improvement throwing with touch, but has shown he can hit on big plays, recording the highest big time throw rate in college (11%).

Overall, Malik has a ton of work to do and should not start his rookie year. He can rely on his legs to survive while he improves as a passer. Malik has proven work ethic and has shown year to year improvement, especially on his footwork. Especially in a subpar Quarterback league, the best bet is a player who has the highest ceiling. Malik is the only one who has the traits to be an All-Pro cornerstone Quarterback. He has all the uncoachable talent, and will be a star if he can refine his game. Malik must be put in a system that builds around his strengths. There's a solid chance Malik Willis never amounts to anything in the NFL, but is the only Quarterback worth betting on in the first round.

Strengths:

- Arm Strength
- Running Ability
- Playmaking
- Arm Talent

Weaknesses:

- Hero Ball
- Pocket Habits

Progressions and Reads
Throwing Mechanics

Pro Comparison: Kyler Murray – Elite playmaker who can win with his legs and his rocket arm. He sometimes tries to do too much behind the line and plays out of control.

Grade: Middle/Late First

21. Arnold Ebiketie

Penn State – EDGE #6

Arnold Ebiketie is a prospect I am higher on than most. He bet on himself this year, transferring from Temple, and it paid off. Ebiketie was a top rusher in college this year, and has shown he can consistently win pass rush sets in the college level. He bursts off the line, and is the best technician in the draft. His hand usage is phenomenal and plans his moves each down. Ebiketie has a toolbox of moves and counters, and is great at finding gaps. Unfortunately, he doesn't have the same athletic ceiling as the other top edge rushers, but produced well at the combine (9.12 RAS). His size (6"2 250) is concerning, and he can get stonewalled in the run and pass game. Ebiketie is a high floor edge rusher who knows how to win, even if he lacks elite traits.

Strengths:

Hand Usage
Technician Burst Finisher

Weaknesses:

Size
Power Rush
Top Tier Athleticism

Grade: Late First

22. Jahan Dotson

Penn State – WR #3

Jahan Dotson is one of the most underrated prospects in the draft. The alpha receiver at Penn State, Dotson produced against top competition. He's only 5'10 180, and most of his issues stem from his small frame. Dotson played all over the field in college, but teams may prefer him to line up in the slot. He plays with nuance, and knows how to find open spaces in zones. Dotson breaks well on routes and consistently gets separation. Dotson may have the best hands in the class, and manages to win contested catches despite his size. Dotson was weighed down by poor quarterback play, and constantly made highlight reel catches to snag poor throws. He doesn't offer much YAC, and may face injury issues due to his frame. His speed isn't elite, and he won't win from athleticism. It's easy to notice that Dotson is a heck of a football player. He performed the best in his most challenging games this season, and is determined to win every route. Even with his size concerns, Dotson manages to win against top corners on the outside. Besides his frame, Dotson has very few holes in his game. He can run a full route tree, and can be a high target receiver. Dotson profiles as a high level slot receiver, who has the ability to line up on the outside.

Strengths:

Hands

Route Running

Slot Ability

Production

Weaknesses:

Frame

Lacks High End Speed

Potential Injury Concerns

Grade: Late First

23. Trent McDuffie

Washington – CB #3

McDuffie was a lockdown corner this year, only allowing 111 yards all season. His calling card is zone coverage, where he uses his quick feet and good eyes to make plays. He may have the best football IQ in the class, and coaches rave about his work ethic and coachability. McDuffie isn't limited to zone, and has displayed the ability to mirror receivers and stay with them in coverage. The big red flag is McDuffie's size, not only is he 5'11, but he has 29" arms (5%), which will take him off some team's big boards. His length shows up in the run game, where he reads plays well, but has trouble getting through lineman. Washington rarely used McDuffie in press, most likely due to his arm length, and it will be surprising if he becomes a press-man corner. His ball production was low, even with limited targets, and he may struggle against bigger receivers. It's unfortunate that McDuffie has size concerns, because he is a technically sound corner otherwise. Expect McDuffie to start on a zone defensive team, where he can play to his strengths. His length limits him from ever being an island corner, but McDuffie can be productive otherwise.

Strengths:

- Footwork
- Zone Ability
- Mirroring
- Tackling

Weaknesses:

- Limited Snaps in Man
- Length
- Pushed in Run Game
- Guarding Bigger Receivers

Grade: Late First

24. Treylon Burks

Arkansas – WR #4

Burks was the focal point of Arkansas's offense this year, accounting for 37.4% off their total receiving yards. He was consistent all year, and had arguably his best game against Alabama. Treylon is a big body receiver (6'3 225), who thrives at the catch point, using his frame to body smaller corners. He regularly won on the sideline, whether it be deep balls or back shoulder routes. Burks has arguably the best hands in the class, and plucks balls out of thin air. He played 77% of his snaps in the slot, and may be a primarily slot receiver in the NFL. His route running is a concern, and he can't consistently get separation, which is a massive red flag for a receiver.

There were also plays where Burks lacked effort altogether, especially when the ball wasn't coming his way. That's a habit that must be broken immediately. He recorded a 4.4 shuttle (25%) and a 7.28 3-cone (20%), further adding to his change of direction issues. Burks was near impossible to guard 1v1, and used his elite size-speed combo to be a walking mismatch. However, he tested poorly at the combine, running a 4.55 40 (58%), 33" vertical (36%), looking sluggish overall. With Burks, scouts will have to decide between game tape and combine testing in order to fully gauge his athletic profile.

To his benefit, Burks possess lower body strength that makes him a YAC threat, and offers value as a gadget player. Treylon is a tantalizing prospect, as he dominated in college and displayed athletic traits, yet he may be another contested catch draft bust (JJAW, N'Keal Harry). He has the potential to be a true receiver one, but needs to polish his route running first. Treylon's lack of separation may cause him to disappoint in the NFL, but he has the production, ball skills, and YAC ability to bet on.

Strengths:

Ball Skills

Body Control

Mismatch Ability

Hands

YAC

Weaknesses:

Separation

Inconsistent Route Running

Blocking

Effort Concerns

Combine Testing

Grade: Late First

25. Andrew Booth Jr.

Clemson – CB #4

Booth is a five star recruit who is a great pickup at the bottom of the first round. He wins with his athleticism, where he is fluid and fast enough to keep up with any receiver. Booth has the moldable traits you look for in a rookie corner, but his technique still needs work. His reaction time is slow, and he clearly needs more reps in coverage. Booth's ball skills are evident, and he uses his long arms to make plays on the ball. However, he was beaten by bigger receivers at Clemson, and could struggle with some physical NFL wideouts. Booth's tackling needs work, recording a 45.5 PFF tackle grade, and will have to clear that up in order to stay on the field. He's currently a primarily man corner, but can play all around if his zone skills and instincts improve. Booth has the natural talent to start right away as a CB2, and will thrive in a situation like Buffalo, where he can learn from Tre White while guarding secondary receivers. If Booth can get more comfortable in his position, and learn the nuances and instincts of playing corner, he can become a true all around defender.

Strengths:

Fluid

Ball Skills

Athleticism

Weaknesses:

Reaction Time

Guarding Bigger Receivers

Tackling

Grade: Late First/Early Second

26. George Pickens

Georgia – WR #5

Pickens is an intriguing prospect who teams will have to bet on. As a true freshman, Pickens was arguably the best receiver in the country, racking up 725 yards and eight touchdowns. Going into his sophomore year, Pickens was looked at as a potential top ten pick. Unfortunately, Pickens took a step back, largely due to Georgia's poor Quarterback room. Pickens then tore his ACL this summer, and only played 63 snaps. He has true X receiver size at 6'3 195, and uses his frame at the catch point. Pickens squares up and attacks Cornerbacks, and possesses arguably the best ball skills in the class. Pickens recorded the lowest career drop rate of any prospect this year at only 2.1%. He contorts his body to make catches, resulting in some impressive highlight reel plays. Pickens has good, but not elite, route running, and occasionally rounds routes. A willing blocker, Pickens is able to help out a team's rushing attack. His instincts are among the best in the class, knowing when to use his hands and understanding where the sideline is.

The big question with Pickens is around his juice post injury. Before his ACL tear, Pickens was fluid in his movements and burst off the line. In his limited 2021 play, Pickens had the same overall talent, but looked more sluggish and stiff when running. He was a YAC threat pre-injury, but was quiet after the catch in 2021. Pickens lacked the explosiveness needed to truly dominate in the NFL. He wasn't yet a year removed from injury, so he hopefully will improve this offseason. Pickens had an impressive showing at the combine, and ran a 4.47 40. He finished with a 9.36 40, a good sign that he has further recovered from his injury. With Pickens, if he can return to 2019 form, teams are getting a true #1 receiver who knows how to win. If Pickens can never fully return to the way he was, he profiles as an outside receiver who can compliment an offense. There are rarely receivers who truly possess the skills to command an offense, so Pickens is worth the bet.

Strengths:

Ball Skills

Instincts

Hand Usage

Physicality

Weaknesses:

ACL tear

Route Running isn't Elite

Lacks Elite Speed

Lost Juice in 2021

Grade: Early Second

27. Chad Muma

Wyoming – LB #2

Chad Muma was the mic and defensive leader at Wyoming. He has a nose for the ball, and thrives as a tackler, racking up stats all season. Muma can both blitz the quarterback and thrive in pursuit, showing off his explosiveness. He faced poor competition at Wyoming, but displayed great athleticism on the field and at the combine (9.77 RAS). In coverage, his technique needs work, however Muma has the coverage instincts necessary to improve. He isn't nimble on his feet, and has poor change of direction, which prevents him from playing man coverage. He is already excellent in the run game, and provides day one production. The switch from Wyoming to the NFL is large, and Muma will have to deal with a learning curve. Muma has the tools to grow and become an all around linebacker in the run, blitz and pass game.

Strengths:

Tackling Explosive Pursuit Traits

Weaknesses:

Clunky
Change of Direction
Coverage technique
Competition

Grade: Top Forty

28. Lewis Cine

Georgia – S #2

Lewis Cine has plenty of experience at the Safety position, playing all three years at Georgia. Cine played the deep safety role, guarding large areas of open field. He's extremely rangy, and covers ground extremely fast. Cine has the athleticism to play single high, recording a 9.99 RAS at the combine. His strengths are equally mental as they are physical, and Cine is the type of player you want manning your defense. He was a defensive leader at Georgia, and won't have any problem taking that role as a rookie. Cine is able to read the Quarterback's eyes while not falling for misdirection plays. He picks up routes well, and has shown the ability to find the open receiver.

Cine isn't a perfect prospect, and has some obvious struggles. His change of direction is only average, not something you want out of an elite Safety prospect. Cine's tackling is a big flaw, missing 7% of career tackle attempts, and must be fixed in the NFL. Weighing in at only 199, Cine is definitely on the skinnier side. He won't be an enforcer, and bigger bodied receivers may push him around. Overall, Cine has the tape and athletic testing of a starting Safety. Teams may be wary of his size, but Cine's speed and coverage instincts make up for his frame. He can be a plug in safety in round one, and a long term starter at the position.

Strengths:

Rangy
Reads routes
Pursuit
Coverage Instincts Eyes

Weaknesses:

Tackling Thin
Not an Enforcer Stiff Hips
Aided by Georgia Front 7

Grade: Top Forty

29. Travis Jones

UConn – IDL #2

On a terrible UConn team, Travis Jones managed to make his presence heard. He plays at a dense 6'4 325, and uses his build to gain leverage. Jones is a powerful rusher who collapsed the pocket at will. He drives his feet and attacks head on. Jones has an elite bull rush, which he then uses to counter a swim move. His arms are long and thick, helping Jones terrorize interior blockers. He has shown that he can win pass rush sets, but Jones hasn't produced much in run defense. Jones isn't a liability, but he stays quiet and doesn't rack up highlight reel plays. He's mostly one dimensional, and can play either nose tackle or 3-tech. Jones dominated the senior, showing off his 1v1 ability. Jones put on a show at the combine, recording a 9.40 RAS. His 4.92 40 and 7.33 3-Cone proved that Jones has explosiveness on the interior. Jones is a day one impact player as a pass rusher, who will only get better if he improves his run defense.

Strengths:

Pocket Collapser Powerful
Pass Rush Arsenal
Ability to Win Sets

Weaknesses:

Run Defense
Limited Versatility

Grade: Top Forty

30. Troy Andersen

Montana State – LB #3

An extremely intriguing prospect, Andersen is a small school player that teams should not overlook. Anderson started off his college career as a Running Back, switched to Quarterback his next season, played both Linebacker and Running Back as a Junior, and finished off his senior year as a full time Linebacker. His athletic ability is off the charts, testing as the most athletic linebacker ever recorded (10 RAS). Andersen has ideal size, elite speed, change of direction skills, and the overall football instincts to play multiple positions in college. His tackling is already a strong point, and will only improve. However, Anderson is clearly new to the linebacker position, and isn't a polished player by any means. While his athletic abilities allow him to chase down anyone, Anderson takes poor angles to ballcarriers. On downhill plays, he isn't targeted onto players, and runs like a headless chicken. Anderson has the instincts to learn coverage, but is new to the nuances of the passing game, and will get abused by offensive coordinators. His level of competition was poor, and it will be a big jump from Montana State to the pros. He did perform well at the Senior Bowl, and showed he can hang with top prospects.

Anderson clearly loves football, and gives 100% every play. If any team is looking to take a risk on a high potential defender, Anderson is the perfect fit. With only a year of Linebacker under his belt, he has plenty of room to grow, and offers the athletic profile you rarely see in the draft. Troy Anderson may rarely see the field year one, but has all the tools to be a star Linebacker.

Strengths:

Size

Athleticism

Pursuit

Aggressive

Downhill Running

Weaknesses:

Competition

Coverage Skills

Angles

Blindly Running

Grade: Early/Middle Second

31. Logan Hall

Houston – IDL #3

Replacing first rounder Payton Turner, Logan Hall was the star of Houston's defense. Hall is a player that pops off the screen, standing at a menacing 6'6". Hall has a large frame, which allows him to push lineman back. He has a great combo of speed and size (9.40 RAS), and will win reps on pure physicality, plowing through offensive linemen. The bull rush is Hall's go to move, and he finishes plays with his high motor. He can struggle to gain leverage, and his balance definitely needs improvement. While Hall produced as a pass rusher, he still lacks refinement. Hall played primarily Defensive Tackle for Houston, but is a bit of a tweener at only 285. He presents an interesting enigma for NFL coaches, too large to play Edge, but a smaller Defensive Tackle. Hall has traits to be a problem as a push rusher, and could use his tweener size as a mismatch instead of a disability. He's a special player you don't see too often, and can hopefully be a unicorn on the defensive line. With the athletic potential to be a game wrecker, Hall is worth selecting if coaches can hone his skills into a single position. He may not be a day one starter, but Hall has true All-Pro potential.

Strengths:

Length

Bull Rush

Motor

Weaknesses:

Tweener

Raw – Relies on Athleticism

Balance

Loses Leverage

Grade: Early/ Middle Second

32. Nik Bonitto

Oklahoma – Edge #7

Bonitto has produced in college over the past two seasons, earning the highest pass rush grade in the country. His calling card is his speed rush, which he constantly uses to win reps. With the best bend in the class, Bonitto bursts off the line and speeds towards the quarterback. His straight line speed isn't his only way to win, with a plethora of spin and hand moves in his arsenal. Bonitto knows how to get to the quarterback, and racks up sacks. He occasionally drops back into coverage, and excels in pursuit. Bonitto's biggest concern is his size at 6'3 248 (20%), and he can get overpowered and pushed around. His frame renders him useless in the run game, and he doesn't have the power to push through guards. Bonitto exhibited his twitch at the combine, running a 4.54 40 (98%), and 4.23 shuttle (92%), to finish out with a 9.35 RAS. Like Azeez Olujari last year, Bonitto has shown a clear way to win reps, which is crucial in the NFL. He doesn't have the size or run defense to be a true Edge 1 on a defense, but Bonitto can thrive as a pass rush specialist.

Strengths:

Pass Rush Arsenal

Bend

Speed Rush

Release

Drop Back Ability

Motor

Weaknesses:

Strength

Size

Run Game

One Dimensional

Grade: Early/Mid 2nd

33. Daniel Faalele

Minnesota – OT #5

Watch any Minnesota game, and Faalele is the first player you'll see. Watch his future NFL games, and Faalele will still be the first player you'll see. Faalele is built like The Mountain from Game of Thrones, standing at a ginormous 6'8 360, with massive 35" arms. Hailing from Australia, Faalele only started playing football in 2016, and is still learning the game. He is obviously impenetrable to a bull rush, and wins reps once locked in. Faalele's technique is raw, and he is prone to be beaten on the outside with speed. He doesn't play to his size, and needs to be more aggressive in both the run and pass game. Faalele is a pure developmental tackle, who projects more as a right tackle, where he won't be faced with as much speed. A player of Faalele's size is clearly a mystery, and his conditioning and movement skills will have to be closely monitored. He is best used in a power run game scheme, where his floor is to "fill space" with his massive frame. Faalele improved this year at Minnesota, and his upwards trend is a good sign. Faalele may never start an NFL game, but if properly developed, he can be a cornerstone right tackle.

Strengths:

Frame

Arm Length and Strength

Potential

Weaknesses:

Conditioning

Aggression

Speed Rushers

Technique – Plays where he is "just there"

Grade: Early Second

34. Kenny Pickett

Pittsburgh – QB #2

Kenny Pickett was easily the most spectacular Quarterback prospect this season. Following three unremarkable seasons, Pickett exploded onto the scene, leading Pittsburgh to relevancy while finishing as a Heisman finalist. Pickett is the most accurate Quarterback in the class, throwing with anticipation and touch. He is efficient as a short distance passer and throws a tight ball. He's nuanced as a passer, placing the ball where only the receiver can reach it. Pickett excels on passes where he can drop the ball in a bucket and allow the receiver to run under it. Passing feels natural to Pickett, whether it be standing in the pocket or on the run. He can hit throws on all three levels, and his mechanics are not a concern. Pickett has the confidence to make any throw and place the ball wherever it is needed.

While Pickett has all the basic tools to play the Quarterback position, he lacks the separating piece to vault him to elite status. His athleticism is average, and he doesn't have a rocket arm either. Pickett threw a lot of checkdowns at Pitt and won't take the top off a defense. Pickett's underlying issue is his pocket presence. He gets flustered in the pocket, and scrambles at an alarmingly high rate. Pickett is constantly moving in the pocket and needs to stand his ground more. He breaks the play down before letting it develop, and must get the ball out faster. His processing in the pocket is alarming for a 5th year senior. Pickett is relatively pro ready, but lacks the high ceiling of a first round Quarterback prospect.

At the Combine, Pickett's hands were measured at only 8½ inch hands, the smallest of any Quarterback in recent history. Pickett wears two gloves, clearly compensating for his hand size, but could struggle to throw a larger NFL ball in poor weather. His hands are unprecedented in the NFL which leads to obvious question marks. Kenny Pickett has the highest floor of the QB prospects. He can operate an offense and make NFL caliber throws. If Pickett can improve his pocket navigation he can start immediately. However, he doesn't offer extreme high end Quarterback play. He profiles as a high floor rookie with low pro bowl potential.

Strengths:

Throwing Mechanics

Accuracy

Nuanced Passer

Production

Weaknesses:

Elite Traits

Leaves Pocket Too Often

Holds Onto Ball

Pro Comparison: Derek Carr – Good feel for the position and has passing talent, but lacks an elite skill to hang his hat on.

Grade: Early to Middle First

35. Leo Chenal

Wisconsin – LB #4

An exciting Linebacker out of Wisconsin, Chenal is an exciting pick in the second round. Chenal bursts off the screen as a burly 250 pound Linebacker exploding through linemen. Best used as a blitzer, Chenal has the rare strength to overpower Guards and Tackles. His blitzing ability is the best in the class, and will be a fun tool for defensive coordinators. Chenal thrives in the run game, recording the highest run defense grade in the country, and uses his insane athleticism to chase down Running Backs. His size allows him to match up with Tight Ends, and in an era with uber athletic Tight Ends in the slot, Chenal is the perfect counter. Disregarding his athleticism, Chenal certainly has room to grow. His hips are occasionally stiff, and he is often behind on plays. Chenal wasn't trusted much in coverage at Wisconsin, and only had one pass breakup in his collegiate career. He is slow to pick up on routes, and improving his coverage instincts should be his number one priority.

Chenal isn't your all around Linebacker, but has the tools to grow as one. He showed up to the combine and put up an historic showing. Virtually all his testing numbers were elite, and he left Indianapolis with a 9.99 RAS (99% Athlete). In a class full of athletic freaks, Chenal manages to stand out. Similar to Micah Parsons, Chenal isn't an immediate MLB, but can offer so much else. He should be a SAM Linebacker, and used in blitz and run defense packages. His coverage skills leave a lot to be desired, but with his traits anything can be taught. Whichever team picks Chenal is drafting All-Pro potential, but a player who may take a while to truly learn the position.

Strengths:

Freak Athlete

Blitzing

Run Defense

Ability to Guard Tight Ends

Weaknesses:

Coverage Skills

Asked to do Very Little in Coverage

Reading Routes

Occasionally Stiff

Grade: Early/Middle Second

36. Chris Olave

Ohio State – WR #6

A notable name in college football, Chris Olave has been a staple of Ohio State's passing attack. Olave is the best route runner in this class, and is fluid on his breaks. He's nuanced on his routes, and understands how to attack Cornerbacks. His release is fast, and he wasn't stopped by press coverage in college. With Olave's skill set comes an extremely high floor and a player who can step into an offense day one. However, Olave lacks the explosive skill set to be a true number one receiver. He is slender at 187, and physical corners were able to push him around. It's unlikely that Olave heavily bulks after the draft, and NFL Cornerbacks will try to move him at will. While Olave knows how to get the ball in his hands, he struggles to do much after. His YAC is virtually nonexistent, and he only has nine career broken tackles. Olave doesn't struggle athletically, he won't dominate with either speed or power. He's was also a senior this past season, and was the receiver #2 on his own team behind Garrett Wilson. Olave is a surefire WR #2 and one of the safest players in the draft. He has physical limitations and lacks the game changing ability of a Wide Receiver One. Complementary receivers have value in the draft, but not enough to go in the first round.

Strengths:

Elite Route Runner

Fluid

Release

Weaknesses:

No YAC

Slender Build

Lacks High End Traits

Grade: Early/Middle Second

37. Darian Kinnard

Kentucky – OT #6

At 6'5 322, Kinnard has textbook size for a tackle. He holds his base well, and is extremely tough to overpower or bull rush. Kinnard mirrors well and plays with physicality. In the run game, Kinnard is already a force to be reckoned with, and takes every opportunity to maul defenders. Kinnard will instantly impact any team's running attack. Kentucky was a heavy run first offense, and Kinnard still has issues in pass sets. He overextends his hands, and his hand placement overall needs work. Technicians in the NFL will break him down, but Kinnard has the physicality and size to grow as a pass blocker. If Kinnard fails at Tackle, he has all the tools to be a pro bowl Guard. Kinnard speaks his mind on political issues, and it would not be surprising for him to fall to day three due to "character concerns". Kinnard tested poorly at the combine, and his agility skills are concerning for a tackle. He does have 35" arms, which can be a threat if he figures out how to use them. It's hard to pass up a player with the frame and physicality like Kinnard. He is a project tackle, and one who can be molded by the right coach into a talented starter.

Strengths:

Frame

Base

Run Blocking

Mirroring

Weaknesses:

Hand Placement

Agility

Overextends Hands

Grade: Middle Second

38. Christian Watson

North Dakota State – WR #7

Arguably the biggest riser of the pre draft process, Watson has been shooting up draft boards. He has the ideal frame for a Wide Receiver at 6'4 208. Watson offers an insane size and speed combo, running a 4.36 40 at the combine. You virtually never see players as tall as Watson run as fast as he did, and it shows up on tape through his vertical ability. Watson can stretch the field and has pure homerun speed. Playing in a run heavy offense, Watson is a very talented blocker, and gives full effort every play. He has great YAC ability and can turn every play into a big gain. He faced subpar competition at NDSU, and didn't dominate like you expect out of small school prospects. His release is both slow and raw, and will struggle against press. He has the bend to run routes, but lacks technique in his breaks. At his height, you want him to use his frame at the catch point more and moss smaller corners. He also had issues with drops (13% drop rate), and his hands need to be more consistent for him to be a true X receiver. Watson has gadget ability, and can be fed touches behind the line.

He was a star at the Senior Bowl, and Watson proved he can match up against top college corners. He then obliterated the NFL combine, with superhuman numbers across the board. He scored a 9.97 RAS (99%), and displayed his explosive traits in front of a plethora of scouts. Watson will take time to acclimate to NFL corners, especially at the line of scrimmage. He will most likely be a pure vertical threat and gadget player as a rookie, and will stay as that if he fails to pan out. While he is much less technically sound than most other receiver prospects, he has the ability to become a true Wide Receiver 1. Watson is a high risk pick in the second round, but his ceiling is sky high as well.

Strengths:

Superhuman Traits
Size and Speed Combo Deep Threat
Gadget Ability Blocking Competitor

Weaknesses:

Competition
Release
Route Running
Drop Issues
Contested Catches

Grade: Middle Second

39. Jalen Pitre

Baylor – S #3

Jalen Pitre was the swiss army knife for Baylor's defense. Pitre primarily played in the slot, but took snaps from the box and line of scrimmage. He's extremely fluid and can change direction at will. Pitre showed off his range in pursuit of running backs or as the QB spy. Pitre has a nose for the ball, making plays in the backfield and in coverage. His tackling is great, and he has incredible run game instincts. Baylor occasionally used Pitre as an edge rusher, where he can win as a blitzer. Pitre has a slender build at 5'11 198 lbs, and should bulk up in the NFL. He is too skinny to collapse a line of scrimmage, and can get pushed around by bigger blockers. Pitre loves to hit and plays with plenty of aggression, but lacks the frame to body receivers at the next level. Pitre has only taken 15 snaps at deep safety and hasn't proven himself in high zone coverage. He has the coverage instincts to succeed as a true safety, but he lacks experience at the position. Pitre excelled while playing traditional safety at the Senior Bowl, offering a glimpse of what he may become. He was able to solidify his speed and change of direction traits at the senior bowl, but also highlighted his thin frame.

Pitre is currently more of a LB/CB hybrid, who can play all over the front third of a defense. He has the instincts and traits to be much more than that if he can learn how to cover deep. Pitre must be used correctly, and can easily be drafted to a system that plays him in the wrong position. Similar to former hybrid prospect Isaiah Simmons, Pitre must be played in a role that can magnify his strengths. A team that slots Pitre in at single high safety as a rookie will ruin him, giving Pitre more bust potential than other players. He is best used as a Slot or Box Safety as a rookie, and given plenty of opportunities to make plays around the line of scrimmage. He should be eased into a deep safety role as he learns to read and defend coverages.

Strengths:

Pursuit

Fluid

Nose for Ball

Versatile

Tackling

Instincts

Playmaker

Run Defense

Weaknesses:

Slender

No Experience as a True Safety

Easily Misused

Grade: Middle Second

40. Daxton Hill

Michigan – S #4

The former 5-Star out of Michigan, Dax Hill is a highly touted safety prospect. Dax thrives as a quick and incredibly rangy Safety, who can cover ground and is quick to the ball. His footwork is polished, and his instincts allow him to make plays on the field. Dax played mostly slot this year, where he covered receivers in man coverage. Dax has the movement skills to keep up with both slot and outside receivers. Hill is barely six feet and is just over 190 pounds. While he plays physical, Dax is beaten by bigger receivers and will struggle to guard any Tight Ends who easily box him out. His wingspan is insanely long, allowing him to make plays on the ball even with a height disadvantage. Hill puts in the effort, but lacks the power to truly impact the run game. He hasn't played much zone coverage, but has the movement skills and instincts to improve. Dax shouldn't play deep safety as a rookie, but should eventually move into that role. As a rookie, Dax is best used in the slot, where he can even play Cornerback in an instant. His floor is as an average slot only player, with the potential to be a rangy all around Safety.

Strengths:

Quick Footwork
Versatile Man Coverage Aggressive
Instincts

Weaknesses:

Small
Can't Guard Tight Ends
Boxed Out Average in Run Game Mostly Slot in College

Grade: Middle Second

41. Cameron Thomas

San Diego State – Edge #8

Cam Thomas is a three year starter from San Diego State, who has been productive since he stepped on the field. He was the commanding piece of San Diego State's defense, and lined up all around the defensive line. He's a bit of a tweener at 6'4 270, and doesn't quite fit the athletic profile of either position. Thomas can play inside, but should primarily rush from the outside in the NFL. He has strong hands which he uses to swim through blocks. Thomas has go-to pass rush moves, and can win with counters. Thomas true pass rush instincts, a talent that is hard to teach as a rusher. He lacks explosive strength and can get stonewalled when he uses power. His quickness on the inside makes him a mismatch, but if Thomas can put on muscle he can be a true Edge rusher. Thomas profiles as an average starter on the defense, who thrives in the run game and is able to be moved around. However, if Thomas is properly targeted as an outside rusher he can win consistent reps with his agility and pass moves.

Strengths:

Pass Rush Moves

Motor

Frame

Run Game

Weaknesses:

Tweener

Power

Competition

Grade: Middle Second

42. Jamaree Salyer

Georgia – IOL #4

Jamaree Salyer did everything Georgia asked from him. He played every position on the offensive line, switching whenever anyone got injured. Salyer mirrors well, and is a proficient run blocker. His release is quick and he uses his hands well. Salyer is built like a Defensive Tackle, making him hard to bull rush. However, Salyer has poor balance and can miss when he picks up blocks. Salyer struggles with blocking in space, and teams will likely transition him to guard. Salyer faced elite competition at Georgia, and held his own against Will Anderson (#1 player in 2023). He doesn't offer crazy high upside, but Salyer is a good pickup for a team looking to add pieces to their offensive line. He has shown the capability to block against top talent, and can move along the offensive line. His frame and mediocre athleticism project him more to Guard. While not the sexiest of picks, Salyer is a dependable addition to the offensive line.

Strengths:

Versatility

Hands and Counters

Proven Against Top Competition

Weaknesses:

Picking up Blitzers

Big but has Anchor Issues

Lacks High End Traits

Grade: Middle Second

43. Perrion Winfrey

Oklahoma – IDL #4

Winfrey is a slimmer Defensive Tackle (290 lbs), and is oftentimes labeled as a tweener. He is explosive off the line, and is agile and quick in his rush. Winfrey has lots of juice, and uses a polished swim move. He uses his speed and size combo to split blocks. Winfrey also has a bull rush in his arsenal, and can win pass rush sets. His 35” arms are strong, and he can win leverage battles. While he is effective in the pass game, Winfrey’s size limits his ability as a run defender. He isn’t the run stuffer that teams look for in a nose tackle, and can get taken out of plays altogether. Winfrey will struggle against bigger offensive linemen, and will have to resort to his finesse game. Winfrey was invited to the Senior Bowl, and was one of the best players on the field. He showed off his talented burst, and was consistently winning pass rush reps. Winfrey could be moved towards the outside, but is primarily a 3-tech. Winfrey’s size is concerning, and he lacks the run defense of most interior defenders, but he has the skill and athleticism to be productive as a pure pass rusher. He projects as a day one starter who is packaged in pass rush plays.

Strengths:

Burst

Long and Strong Arms

Swim Move

Bull Rush

Pass Rush Ability

Weaknesses:

Tweener

Small For DT

Run Defense

Grade: Middle Second

44. David Ojabo

Michigan – Edge #9

David Ojabo moved to America as a teenager, only starting to play football at 17. This season at Michigan was the first time he ever received real playing time, and his game is a work in progress. His get off is quick, and is combined with an explosive speed rush. Ojabo has bend in his rush, which allows him to win on the outside. He has the athletic traits to be an effective edge rusher. Ojabo has the tools to win as a pass rusher, but lacks a pass rush arsenal. He has no power game whatsoever, and won't be able to purely beat NFL lineman with raw athleticism. Ojabo is a liability in the run game, without the power and football IQ to make plays. He won't play on run downs, penciling him in as a pass rush specialist. While Ojabo produced eleven sacks this year, he was playing alongside Aidan Hutchinson. Hutchinson drew most of the attention, allowing Ojabo to have 1v1's on the other side.

With any weaknesses in his game, Ojabo has the ability to mend them. He knows so little about the game of football, and is learning every time he steps on the field. His growth at Michigan was tremendous, and he has the work ethic that is needed in developmental players. Ojabo tested well at the combine (9.4 RAS), solidifying his status as an elite athlete. However, things took a big turn when Ojabo tore his Achilles at his Pro Day. His injury puts his entire draft status in jeopardy, as it's hard to draft a player who relies on athleticism after a serious injury. Ojabo will miss his rookie season, but the real question is whether he will lose explosiveness in his rush. My grade for Ojabo is not changed much by his injury, but it wouldn't be a shock to see Ojabo fall to the later rounds. Injury-withstanding, Ojabo is an athletic rusher who has a lot of room to grow. He has the ceiling of an elite complementary rusher, as he can't do much in the run game. Ojabo's draft status relies on his recovery from injury, but is a good player to stash on a team as he recovers and grows as an edge rusher.

Strengths:

Bend

Speed

Barely Played Football

Weaknesses:

Power Rush

Pass Rush Moves

Run Game

Football Knowledge

Achilles Injury

Grade: Middle Second

45. Devonte Wyatt

Georgia – IDL #5

Devonte Wyatt was both physically and professionally overshadowed by his teammate Jordan Davis this season. Wyatt carries his own weight at Georgia, contributing in both the run and pass game. He is extremely explosive off the line, and wins with his quick first step. His overall speed and agility is absurd for a defensive tackle. Wyatt has a good bend and can use power in his rush, but lacks power moves. He's slightly undersized, and won't collapse the pocket like a Nose Tackle. Wyatt played on an elite Georgia defensive line, and wasn't focused on by the offensive line. He was able to do his own thing, winning with finesse in the pass game and playing to his strengths. Wyatt was phenomenal at the Senior Bowl, showing off his ability to win 1v1 sets. He followed that up with an incredible Combine performance. He ran a superhuman 4.77 40 (only .03 seconds slower than Aidan Hutchinson), and ended with a 9.59 RAS (96%).

While he's clearly an explosive athlete, it's easy for undersized defensive lineman to get suffocated in the interior. Wyatt lacks the superhuman strength of Jordan Davis, and doesn't have the length of a Logan Hall. The jump to the NFL will be tough for Wyatt, as the bigger IOLs will not be threatened by his size. Plenty of elite Defensive Tackle prospects have entered the league and struggled to produce at an elite level. Derrick Brown and Quinnen Williams were both highly touted prospects, more so than Wyatt, and haven't played like extreme high end players. Defensive Tackle is a hard position to take over the game, and it's easier to end up as a pocket pusher or run stuffer. He is already 24 years old, which hinders his potential and room to grow. Recently, character concerns about Wyatt have been floated, including some domestic violence rumors from the past. Most of this is probably just normal pre-draft rumors that are far from accurate. Wyatt has pass rush ability, and will be able to win 1v1's in the interior. However, he lacks the takeover ability to influence an entire game. Wyatt profiles as an average Defensive Tackle who can win as a pass rusher.

Strengths:

Explosive Get Off
Bend Finesse

Weaknesses:

Slightly Undersized Lacks Power Moves Age
Helped by Georgia's DLine Lacks Takeover Ability

Grade: Middle Second

46. Trey McBride

Colorado State – TE #1

The top ranked tight end in the class, McBride offers a projectable skillset. The focal point of Colorado State's offense, McBride accounted for nearly 40% of the team's passing yards. His level of competition was weak, but McBride was keyed on by the defense, and suffered from poor Quarterback play. McBride is a downfield target, and is WR-like at the catch point. He has the speed to outrun Linebackers, and will win in the seam. Even with McBride's Wide Receiver tendencies, he doesn't shy away from blocking. McBride won't anchor a run game, but he is far from a liability in run packages. McBride is slender for a Tight End, and won't out muscle defenders after the catch. He didn't have much YAC at Colorado State. McBride is a reliable receiving Tight End, similar to the likes of Mike Gesicki or Dallas Goedert. He lacks the freakish athleticism of Kyle Pitts, that vaulted him into elite status as a prospect. McBride will never be in the highest echelon of Tight Ends, but can round out a team's passing attack. Expect him to produce as a rookie, and should be drafted to a vertical passing offense.

Strengths:

Speed – 4.56 40
Hands
College Productivity

Weaknesses:

Competition

Slender

YAC

Won't Win With Power

Grade: Middle Second

47. Boye Mafe

Minnesota – Edge #10

Boye Mafe is an edge rusher who thrived off his athleticism. He has a strong build, and is explosive off the line. Mafe won with his strong hands, and repeatedly used the hand chop. He has a strong motor and finishes plays. His strength and power shows up on tape, and he can move lineman with his strong lower body. Mafe's pass rush is solely based on athletic abilities, and he will need moves to win the NFL. Mafe showed limited moves in college, and doesn't have pass rush counters. Mafe is quiet in the run game, and is not yet a three down player. Mafe excelled at the combine, jumping 38", running a 4.53 40, and scored a 9.91 RAS (99%). Boye Mafe will be 24 by the start of the 2022 NFL season, and it's difficult to draft a development player who is also an older prospect. There's no denying Mafe's traits, and if he puts it together he will be a dangerous pass rusher. However, in a draft so deep at Edge, there are other prospects who have proven themselves as rushers. Ultimately, Mafe has the traits to succeed as a pass rusher, but is both raw and an older player. He can start year one on pass rush downs, and is a developmental option.

Strengths:

Hands

Power

Explosive

Weaknesses:

Run Game

Refinement

Pass Rush Arsenal

Grade: Middle Second

48. Sam Howell

North Carolina – QB #3

Sam Howell is a third year starter from North Carolina. Howell was impressive in his freshman and sophomore year, and was a expected top ten pick entering 2021. Nearly all of UNC's offensive weapons left, and both Howell and the program took a step back. His stats were solid, but didn't reflect the upward trend you look for in a prospect. Howell has NFL caliber arm strength and can fit the ball into tight windows. He excels on crosser routes, and has full confidence in his arm to make throws. He can hit receivers all over the field, allowing for NFL coaches to open up the playbook. Howell ran for over eleven hundred yards this season, and is able to scramble on dead plays. He played in an RPO heavy system, where he had a tendency to read one pass catcher and take off.

His progressions were poor this season, and he would stare down a receiver before rifling the ball. This is a classic rookie trait that will result in a lot of interceptions early on. While his arm talent is evident, Howell's throwing motion needs tweaking. It's comparable to a targeted laser, where Howell loads it up before throwing bullet passes. He must release the ball faster, as throwing windows will shrink at the next level. Howell has a poor pocket presence, and stands like a statue in the pocket before scrambling at the first sight of a defender. Howell's throw on the run isn't great and throws many flustered passes.

Howell needs to stand his ground and maneuver the pocket rather than leaving it altogether. His accuracy is average and won't impress scouts. Howell had a down season, but many of his flaws were a product of his system and supporting cast. He has the talent and experience to be an average NFL starter. Howell lacks the high end traits and “it factor” to be a true star Quarterback. The cerebral part of Howell’s game needs work, and he will need to stand strong in the pocket against NFL blitzers. If he can improve his progressions and is able to make decisions faster, Howell can operate an offense at a successful level. He profiles as an average NFL starter with draftable traits and arm talent, who should be drafted as a solid, sometimes inconsistent, and rarely spectacular Quarterback for the future.

Strengths:

Arm Strength
College Productivity
Ability To Run

Weaknesses:

Pocket Presence Telegraphed Throwing Motion
Progressions

Pro Comparison: Baker Mayfield – Inconsistent reads, but has above average arm talent and the ability to scramble.

Grade: Middle Second

49. Breece Hall

Iowa State – RB #1

The best Running Back in the class, Breece Hall was the leading force behind Iowa State’s offense. Hall is a condensed 5’11 217, and has noticeable lower body strength. He is patient in the backfield and shoots through gaps. When in open field, Hall has violent jukes and runs vertically, a skill that most rookies lack. He is explosive with the ball in his hands and has natural balance. Hall can run both inside and outside, and can play in a multitude of NFL schemes. He adds a strong receiving game and makes plays after the catch. Often underappreciated, Breece Hall is solid in pass protection, which allows him to stay on the field at all times. Not only was he productive in college, but he performed with a terrible offensive line. Hall struggles with power and truck moves, and won't win with them in the NFL. His patience can hurt him, and he is tackled behind the line of scrimmage too often. Hall is relatively short for a running back, making it tougher for him to translate his ball carrier skills. Hall used the NFL combine to solidify himself as the RB #1. He ran a 4.39 40, which is insane for a player who weighs almost 220. He ended up with a 9.96 RAS (99%), and showed off his talented speed and size combo. Running backs are less valued in the NFL draft, but it doesn't take away from Hall's well rounded skill set. He will be a productive bell cow back, who can fit into almost any NFL system.

Strengths:

Speed and Size Combo Shooting Through Gaps
Balance
Poor O-Line
Pass Protection Receiving Ability

Weaknesses:

Tackled behind LOS often Only 5'11
Truck Ability
Positional Value

Grade: Middle/ Late Second

50. Skyy Moore

Western Michigan – WR #8

A small school receiver, Moore is a “loves the game” type of player. He wins with his elite release, and NFL corners will struggle to press him. Skyy has all the top skills that come with a smaller receiver. He has quick feet, fast cuts, and bends his body well. At only 5’10 195, Moore won’t win over the top. His height also limits his sideline ability, and Moore is best used as a pure slot receiver. Labeling Skyy Moore as “Slot Player” is underselling him, and Moore is as versatile as slot players come. He can open up the field with deep play speed (4.41 40). Moore has special YAC ability, using his compact strength and elusive movements to burst through defenders. His hands are consistent and isn’t surprising considering that he recorded the largest hand size of any receiver in the draft (10.25”). He has proven that he can win on all three levels. Moore’s routes are sloppy, but not something that can’t be fixed. Moore’s competition was weak, and his tackle breaking ability may not adjust perfectly to the NFL. Skyy Moore has the talent to be a successful slot option. Besides his height, Moore has few glaring issues in his game. His value as a slot only player is lower than the other versatile receivers. Moore projects as a high value slot option who can produce as a rookie.

Strengths:

Release

Evasive

Strong for Size

Weaknesses:

Competition

Height

Sloppy Routes

Can't play outside

Grade: Middle/Late Second

51. Nakobe Dean

Georgia – LB #5

Nakobe Dean was the glue behind Georgia's outstanding defense. He has veteran football knowledge, allowing him to play as a rookie. Dean is a competitor who gives his full effort on every play. He is an outstanding leader, and a player who can be a locker room help. Dean fell for fakes in coverage, and was caught watching plays. His coverage isn't a liability, but he still has room to grow. He's a good blitz, and thrives in pursuit of the Quarterback. However, Dean's game was aided by the rest of Georgia's defense. He was able to play with an elite D-Line that allowed Dean to take his focus off the run game. The rest of his linebacker crew was also elite, so Dean was able to play a role that mirrored his strengths. The biggest concern with Dean is his athletic profile. He stands at only 5'11 with relatively short arms. Tight Ends are able to bully him, and he can get pushed around during a play. He's not an outstanding athlete, and chose not to test at all during his pre draft process. His length combined with average athletic traits limits his ceiling in coverage. Dean is best used as a WILL Linebacker, who should blitz and be a playmaker on the line. Dean profiles as a high floor linebacker who can help out in a lot of ways, but lacks the tools to become a high impact Middle Linebacker. Dean can start as a rookie, and should offer above average play if used in the right role.

Strengths:

Cerebral Playmaker
Blitzing
Leader Pursuit Angles

Weaknesses:

Falls for Fakes
Length
Athletic Traits
Covered By Georgia's Defense
Pushed Around
Can't Guard Tight Ends

Grade: Middle/Late Second

52. Brandon Smith

Penn State – LB #6

Brandon Smith is yet another perfect mold for the Linebacker position. He stands at 6'3 250, with lengthy 34 ½ arms (98%). He exploded at the combine, recording a 9.97 RAS (99%), with a 4.52 40 (96%). His athleticism shines on tape, where he is able to keep up with most receivers. Smith is twitchy and gets into the backfield, but isn't a downhill runner and has trouble fighting through blocks. He's a good tackler, and puts his long arms to good use when he wraps up ball carriers. Smith is fluid and is comfortable in coverage, but falls for misdirection and graded poorly this season (57). He lacks polish at the position, which is not surprising for a player who only recently turned 21. Smith struggled as tackler, missing over 13% off blocks, but he has the athleticism to improve his technique. With elite tools at a young age, Brandon Smith is a fun player to bet on. He may not start year one, but is a developmental middle linebacker. Smith is a step below Leo Chenal and Troy Andersen as prospects, but offers a similar profile. Smith doesn't have refined technique, but if he can put it together he will be a force in the front seven.

Strengths:

Frame

Athleticism

Workable Coverage Instincts

Rangy

Twitchy

Weaknesses:

Trouble Fighting Through Blocks

Falls for Misdirection

Not Physical

Not a Downhill Runner

Grade: Middle/Late Second

53. Jaquan Brisker

Penn State – S #4

Jaquan Brisker has the ideal mold for a modern day safety. With a similar build to Jevon Holland, Brisker catches the eye. He is uber physical and always looks to make a big hit. Brisker is an immediate force in the run game and is able to wrap up ball carriers. He also has the strength and athleticism to guard Tight Ends. He primarily played as box safety, where he should stay in the NFL. Brisker has plenty of room to grow in pass defense. Brisker is slow to recognize plays, and falls for misdirection. He can get locked onto a single receiver, and is occasionally tentative to the ball. He doesn't yet have the skills to play single high safety, but he has the fluid movements to grow. He ran a 4.49 40, mirroring his ability on tape to quickly cover ground. A good tester with a 9.14 RAS, Brisker has the type of tools that teams can buy into. Brisker profiles as a Strong Safety or Box Safety. The hope is that he will use his physical talent to become a true deep safety while he grows his football IQ. He's an impact Box Safety, with potential to be a big play safety.

Strengths:

Build

Physicality

Run Defense

Box Ability

Weaknesses:

Single High Ability

Tentative

Falls for Misdirection

Grade: Middle/Late Second

54. Bernhard Raimann

Central Michigan – OT #7

Bernhard Raimann moved from Austria his senior year of high school, before committing to play Tight End at Central Michigan. After two years in college, Raimann transitioned to Tackle, adding 60 pounds of weight and starting for the last two seasons. Raimann carried over the athleticism of a Tight End, and is extremely quick and agile. His testing at the Combine solidified his movement skills, where he scored a 9.87 RAS (98%), performing well in every drill. He squares up well with defenders and locks them in. Raimann has good hand placement, but his arms are below 33", which is a general cutoff for Tackles. His lack of length will allow some defenders to beat him with the long arm or snatch techniques. Raimann is strong, and is still growing into his body as an offensive lineman, where he must fill out his frame. He is still developing his technique as a pass blocker, which was evident at the Senior Bowl. His release was slow, and was beaten around the edge by rushers.

Raimann is a developmental tackle, but is already 24 years old, a red flag for non pro-ready prospects. It's hard to invest in a player who is far from being ready as a starter when they are already much older than most of the other players in the draft. His arm length and his age raise some potential for him to bust. Although he's a few years behind, Raimann has shown extreme work ethic in his path to becoming a great tackle. Raimann profiles as a developmental Left Tackle with high end athleticism, who will struggle as a rookie.

Strengths:

Agility

Hand Usage

Still Learning the Position

Squares Up

Weaknesses:

Under 33" Arms

Unpolished Pass Technique

Older Prospect

Grade: Middle/Late Second

55. Jelani Woods

Virginia – TE #2

Woods has been rising up draft boards the last few months, and for good reason. Just looking at Jelani, it's clear to see what scouts are enamored with. Woods is a filled out 6'7 250, and has thick 34" arms. His frame makes him a big target for young Quarterbacks. Woods has good hands but faced fixable drop issues. He has poor blocking technique, but has the stature to fix it. Woods has a limited route tree and primarily runs seam routes. He offers YAC ability as a receiver, and runs angry once he catches the ball. Woods refuses to go down and will fight for extra yards. He is clunky as a runner, and has trouble moving and contorting his massive frame. Woods showed up to the combine and blew it up, running a 4.6 40, a 37.5" vertical, and a 10'9 broad jump. He cleared every possible measurable at Indianapolis, and received a 10 RAS (100%), the highest ever for a Tight End. Woods has a lot of work to do as a technician, but offers elite high end at the position. There's a muddle of slightly above average Tight Ends, and Woods has the rare potential to grow above that. Woods should be scripted touches as a receiver, and used in the slot. His technique is far from perfect, but Woods has the highest upside of any Tight End in the class.

Strengths:

Frame
Athleticism
Catch Radius
YAC

Weaknesses:

Clunky
Limited Route Tree
Unrefined Blocked

Grade: Late Second

56. DeAngelo Malone

Western Kentucky – Edge #11

A five year starter, DeAngelo Malone is a sleeper pick in the draft. Most of his issues stem from his size. Malone is only 234 lbs, and will be one of the lightest rushers in the league. His size allows him to be pushed outside the edge by bigger linemen, which will only increase in the NFL. His balance is also questionable, and he spends too much time on the ground. The best trait in a college edge rusher is having a goto method to win reps, whether it be power, speed or technique. Malone has the ultimate trump card in his speed rush, and he has the bend to consistently win around the edge. He is explosive off the line, and is always a threat to make big plays. Malone isn't a one trick pony, and is able to convert his speed to power. He bursts off the line and speeds towards lineman, before bull rushing them with surprising power. His hand usage is solid, and rounds out a complete pass rush attack. Malone never takes plays off, and looks for a way to involve himself in every snap. With over 3,200 snaps under his belt, Malone is nuanced when rushing the passer. His size limits him in the run game, and he may only play in pass rush packages.

A smaller school player who faced poor competition, Malone was destined to prove his worth at the Senior Bowl. He used his speed and quickness to win reps, but his biggest showing was during the game. Malone used his speed to power rush, and managed to bull rush 340 pound lineman Trevor Penning. Malone is an uber talented pass rusher, who has a complete skill set to win reps. His size is a massive red flag, but if he can put on weight he can break out in the NFL. If Malone stays at 234, he will be a third down pass rusher who provides above average sack ability.

Strengths:

Explosive
Speed Rush
Speed to Power

Weaknesses:

Thin Frame
5th Year Starter
Competition
Run Defense

Grade: Late Second

57. Martin Emerson

Mississippi State – CB #5

Emerson is a quality pickup on day two. He's an extremely long corner with 33.5 inch arms (97%), which he uses to excel at the catch point. His tackling is solid, and he is skilled at run defense. His length makes him a press corner who is extremely physical. Emerson has fast eyes, which allows him to quickly get to the ball. He is calm and confident in his play style, giving off a perfect Cornerback aura. Emerson's big issue is his footwork. He is often caught flat footed, which allows receivers to move him at will. Emerson lacks top end speed and can get beat by top speed receivers. He struggles in off man, and is better suited when he can get his hands on the opposition. Emerson is grabby and will get called for penalties as a rookie, but coaches will hopefully remove this from his game. Emerson's frame presents high upside as a man defender. His footwork and overall speed are concerning, but if Emerson can improve his footwork it may also help his long speed as well. His overall corner instincts are great, which will help him as he attempts to improve his craft. He should be a rotational corner as a rookie, and presents upside as a starting Cornerback.

Strengths:

Length
Press Ability
Physicality
Catch Point Ability Tackling
Instincts

Weaknesses:

Footwork
Top End Speed Off Man
Grabby

Grade: Late Second

58. Christian Harris

Alabama – LB #7

Any three year starter from Alabama should not be overlooked, especially on the defensive side. Christian Harris is very versatile, but lacks the true makeup of a MLB. Harris is explosive as a blitzer, and has the power to move offensive lineman. He attacks in the run game, and has lightning speed in pursuit. Harris has great traits for a linebacker. He tested phenomenally (9.05 RAS), showing off his elite 4.41 speed. His ranginess shows up on tape, where he is never out of the play. Christian's main weakness is his coverage, and he hasn't developed the skills to anchor a defense. He has poor patience, and can be caught on misdirection plays. His coverage IQ is poor, and he struggles to pick up routes. These are all big concerns for a three year starter under Nick Saban, especially for a player who had his best season as a Freshman. Harris has the tools to improve in coverage, but it's harder to bet on his development if he couldn't develop under Saban. He is on the skinnier side, and teams may want him to bulk up and guard tight ends. Harris should be drafted as a SAM linebacker, and his pursuit skills should be maximized in the run game. Hopefully he can develop into MIKE, but that's a bet teams will have to decide on.

Strengths:

Rangy
Explosive Tackling Blitzing

Weaknesses:

Inept in Coverage Lacks Patience
Little Improvement at Alabama

Grade: Late Second

59. Dylan Parham

Memphis – IOL #5

A chess piece for Memphis, Parham moved all over the offensive line. He transitioned from tight end, and it shows it with his quick movement skills. Parham's quickness shows up in stunt plays, as he seeks out defenders when on the run. He has good hands and is quick to strike. Parham gets to the second level, and excels on screen plays. He's talented on double team blocks, and can be used as a secondary blocker. Parham is a lighter offensive line, which gives him a weaker base. He struggled to anchor against powerful bull rushers, and will only be magnified in the NFL. Parham's feel for space needs improvement, and he can miss blocks on blitzers.

Parham is a flawed player, but one who has proven his ability to function across an offensive line. He weighed in 20 pounds heavier at the combine, showing that he has been attempting to bulk up. If Parham can successfully hit the weight room, he projects as a swing lineman. Parham is most suited for Guard, but can fill in at Tackle or Center if needed. He doesn't have the high ceiling of other offensive line prospects, but is a perfect fit for a team looking to add pieces to its line group.

Strengths:

Nimble

Versatile

Second Level Blocker

Aggressive

Weaknesses:

Anchor

Misses Blitzers

Competition

Inconsistent Hands

Grade: Late Second

60. Desmond Ridder

Cincinnati – QB #4

Desmond Ridder has been the leader behind Cincinnati's meteoric rise. Ridder has improved alongside Cincinnati every season in his four years as a starter. He is a true coach's pet, who is more than willing to put in the work to improve. Ridder is the best processor in the class. He makes pre snap reads and goes through his progressions. He knows when to get rid of the ball and is comfortable in the pocket. Ridder does all the little things as a Quarterback and has all the intangibles. He manages the short and intermediate game well, and fits well into the point guard role. While Ridder rarely used his athleticism in college, he recorded a 4.52 40 alongside a 10'7" broad jump.

Ridder is far from a natural passer, and lacks next level arm talent. He rarely threw deep and wasn't very efficient when doing so. Defenses aren't afraid of his deep game, which clogs receiving lanes upfront. Many of Ridder's passing problems come from his awkward throwing motion. It's unnatural and the ball generally doesn't spiral. Ridder's ball placement is poor, and he deals with accuracy issues. Ridder will have a couple sets of solid passing until he throws a ball that misses completely. Similar to Jimmy Garapolo, Ridder has the tendency to occasionally throw a mindblowing awful pass. Ridder has all the tools to navigate a Jimmy G role perfectly. He can comfortably set up an offense and dish the ball to playmakers, without the need to stretch the feed himself.

While Ridder has the work ethic to improve his throwing motion and mechanics, he's improved tremendously as a Quarterback already and may not have much room to grow. Desmond Ridder does all the little things that make a Quarterback great. However, he lacks the true passing talent of some of the other Quarterbacks, and it will be difficult for him to overcome his accuracy issues. If he can clean up his throwing mechanics, Ridder can be a consistent starter. He profiles as a high end fill-in starter who can manage a safe offense. He won't be a cornerstone Quarterback, but has a high floor and can start or be an elite backup for many years.

Strengths:

Pocket Management
Progressions
Keeps Eyes Downfield
Athleticism
Work Ethic

Weaknesses:

Pure Arm Talent Accuracy
Deep Ball
Frame

Pro Comparison: Ryan Tannahill – Smart game manager who lacks high end passing traits. Has athletic traits but tends not to use them.

Grade: Late Second

61. Kenneth Walker III

Michigan State – RB #2

Walker broke out this year, rushing for over 1,600 yards and winning the Doak Walker award for best Running Back. He was first in missed tackles forced, yards after contact, and runs of 15+ yards. Walker wins with a full arsenal of ball carrier moves, and is elusive with the ball in his hands. He is a true home run threat, and can bounce runs to the outside. He has a good change of direction, to go alone with balanced body control. While small (5'9 211), Walker possesses solid strength and is able to break tackles. He's skilled at using blocks, and burst through holes when given the chance.

Unfortunately, Walker struggles with Saquon Barkley syndrome. He has immense talent and playmaking ability, so he often attempts to break every tackle in sight instead of strictly running vertically. He tries to turn every play into a touchdown instead of taking the yards given. His patience in the backfield is a gift and a curse, and Walker must learn when to use it. Walker didn't produce much as a pass catcher, and may only be a two down back in the NFL. His size is a concern, and Walker could have issues with the physicality of the NFL as a rookie. Walker is poor in pass protection, which will sideline him from many pass plays. Walker's run production is translatable, it's the rest of his game that brings concerns. Walker is a true bellcow back who wins in virtually every way. He projects as an impact starter as a rookie, who will unfortunately not play on passing downs. His value as a pure running back is low, but Walker can be a long term successful starter.

Strengths:

- Full Arsenal of Moves
- Home Run Threat
- Finding Gaps
- College Production
- Change of Direction

Weaknesses:

- Pass Protection
- Receiving Back

Small

Less Downhill Running

Grade: Late Second

62. Sean Rhyan

UCLA – IOL #6

Sean Rhyan has three years of tackle experience under his belt, heavily improving each season at UCLA. He is physical with a burly build, and moves well. He is extremely athletic, and tested extremely well at the combine. All-Pro Tristan Wirfs is the only lineman over 320 lbs to jump more than Rhyan's 34" in the vertical and 9'2 in the broad jump. His explosiveness shows up on tape, where Rhyan loves to pop defenders in pass protection. Rhyan's technique still needs work, especially with his hands. He can get caught lunging at defenders and getting caught off balance. He needs to use his athleticism to be a mover in the run game, as opposed to just standing his ground. Rhyan will be 24 as a rookie, so projecting him to improve becomes much more difficult. While he played tackle in college, Rhyan has 32" arms and a more compact build, which suits him better for Guard. He should primarily play on the inside, but can take reps at Tackle if there's an injury. His run blocking needs work, but Rhyan can be a solid starter on the interior as a rookie, with the traits necessary for improvement.

Strengths:

Frame

Athleticism

Feet

Yearly Improvement

Weaknesses:

Lunges

Age

Balance

Run Game

Questionable Base

Grade: Late Second

63. Carson Strong

Nevada – QB #5

Carson Strong has been the overlooked Quarterback of the bunch. His film holds up and Strong is the best pure passer in the class. Throwing is natural to him, whether it be his release or stance. Strong can hit passes on all three levels, but thrives as a deep passer. His deep ball is spectacular, and his ball placement on those throws are near perfect. His best throws are on the sideline, where Strong will be dangerous in the NFL. Around 60% of Strong's passes were on deep routes, and didn't have as much experience reading the intermediate game. Most of his throws are lofty passes which are easier to intercept in the NFL, and Strong needs to throw more fastball passes. He's patient as a passer and allows for routes to develop, but he can wait too long and stare down receivers.

When it comes to nuanced passing and accuracy overall there's no better prospect, but Strong also has the biggest red flag in the class. Strong has dealt with degenerative knee issues since high school, which completely altered the course of his college career. He has no mobility whatsoever, and has no chance at all to lose a defender in the pocket. Modern day Quarterbacks are expected to have some scramble or playmaking ability, and Carson has none. Once a play breaks down it's virtually over for Strong. The bigger issue is with his long term health. His knee is decaying and could be a career ender. NFL teams have done their medicals on Strong, but it's especially concerning for such a young player to be dealing with these injuries already. It will be difficult for teams to draft a cornerstone Quarterback who isn't a sure thing to play ten years. It wouldn't be surprising for Strong to fall late into the draft. Medical issues aside, Strong has the talent to be a solid starter in the NFL. His maneuverability is concerning, but if Strong is put in an air raid system, he has the ability to put up numbers.

Strengths:

Fluidity as a Passer

Deep Ball

Release

Passing Nuance

Weaknesses:

Competition

Mobility

Knee Concerns – Red Flag

Pro Comparison: Later Career Ben Rothlisberger – Has a howitzer of an arm and can complete passes all over the field, but lacks any movement in the pocket.

Grade: Late Second

64. Alec Pierce

Cincinnati – WR #9

A pre-draft riser, Alec Pierce is an alluring pick on day two. He has a big frame at 6'3 210, and could pass for a smaller Tight End. You won't get that from his physical abilities, as Pierce has the speed to win on the sideline. He thrives on the outside, using his speed and size combo to mismatch against corners. Alec is versatile and can also play in the slot, allowing NFL coaches to fit him into their scheme. He has superb ball tracking to go along with steady hands.

With Pierce's size comes stiffness, and he has trouble changing direction. His release is slow, and corners will take advantage of this at the line of scrimmage. Pierce won't win with route running, and can struggle to get separation on crossers and cuts. He has breakaway speed, but isn't a YAC threat to break tackles. Pierce played well at the Senior Bowl, especially in the 1v1 drills. He was a big winner at the combine, scoring a 9.8 RAS (98%). He jumped 41 inches and ran a 4.41 40; both numbers are special for a guy his size. Pierce is a true sideline receiver who wins on ball skills and athleticism. His size makes him a red zone threat, but he's not a true jump ball receiver. He isn't a midfield separator, and has a limited route tree. Alec Pierce plays similarly to Chase Claypool, but lacks his fluidity and change of direction skills. He can start on the outside as a rookie, stretching the field and winning matchups in man. His lack of versatility caps his ceiling, but expect him to contribute immediately.

Strengths:

Speed and Size Combo

Ball Tracking

Hand Usage

Wins on Sideline

Weaknesses:

Stiff

Poor Release

YAC Ability

Route Running

Grade: Late Second/Early Third

65. Kingsley Enagbare

South Carolina – Edge #11

Kingsley Enagbare is an edge rusher with a wide spectrum of reviews. He had the highest pass-rush win rate of any defender in the nation this past season. Kingsley has meat on the bone at 6'4 260. He has long 35" arms which can pack a punch. Kingsley uses them as his goto move and can chop down offensive lineman. He attempts to win with pure power, but he lacks the explosiveness to consistently win. His pass rush overall is consistent, and there are plays where he fully lacks effort. His impact in the run game is not to be understated, as he is able to fully disrupt plays in the backfield. Kingsley is stiff and lacks bend, and can get completely boxed on a play. His technique overall is unpolished and Kingsley oftentimes just charges the offensive line.

He played well at the Senior Bowl, showing off his 1v1 ability. His 40 time at the combine was slow, further solidifying Enagbare's lack of burst. His 37" vertical jump stood out and gave a hint of explosiveness in his game. Kingsley is a tough evaluation, as he showed so much inconsistency in his game, yet managed to win reps.

He is a developmental edge, and teams should look to build off his frame, length, and hand usage. If he can further develop his technique, and perhaps slim down while increasing his twitch, Kingsley will be a dominant force on the defensive line.

Strengths:

Size

Length

Powerful Hands

Win Rate

Run Defense

Weaknesses:

Effort Concerns

Bend

Explosiveness

Motor

Consistency

Grade: Late Second/Early Third

66. Jameson Williams

Alabama – WR #10

Jameson Williams is the classic example of the speed receiver trope. He is the fastest player in the class, with the quickness and speed to completely take the top off a defense. Jameson is a big play threat who can outrun virtually every defender. His release is explosive and allows him to reach top speed immediately. Jameson can be used in screen packages and as a gadget player. He sells his speed well, using it to manipulate defenders.

However, Jameson is far from a down to down receiver. He hasn't proved himself as a middle of the field threat, which is what you want from an X receiver. Jameson is extremely thin at 6'2 180 lbs. His frame will allow physical corners to bully him at the catch point. His hands aren't great, and he was not forced into many contested catch situations. Jameson tore his ACL this season at Alabama, and will likely miss his entire rookie season. The injury will hopefully not impact his speed, which would destroy his game completely. I didn't evaluate Jameson based on his injury status, but a player of his stature will struggle to stay on the field.

Jameson is mostly one dimensional as a receiver, and there are only a handful of teams that will be able to use him correctly. He's far from an X receiver, which drops him from the top tier of receivers. Jameson Williams profiles as a high end deep threat and gadget player.

Strengths:

Lightning Speed

Release

Shifty

Utilizes Speed Well

Deep Threat

Weaknesses:

Possession Ability

Slender – Injury Concerns

ACL Tear

Grade: Late Second/Early Third

67. Max Mitchell

Louisiana – OT #8

Mitchell was the highest graded lineman in the country this year. He played mostly Right Tackle, and has very solid pass blocking technique. His hand usage and mirroring are skilled, and his footwork is fluid. Most of Mitchell's issues stem from his size. While he is a taller tackle at 6'6, Mitchell only weighs 300 lbs. His light frame allows him to be moved by stronger rushers. Mitchell's combine testing was nothing special, and was expected from the tape. He lacks high end traits, and is not going to become an all worldly talent on the offensive line. His run blocking needs work, and he lacks the power to maul opponents at the point of contact. Mitchell may be looked at as a bland pick, and can be an important selection to help bolster a team's pass blocking. He doesn't offer a high ceiling but Mitchell profiles as a day one fill-in starter at Right Tackle.

Strengths:

Mirroring
Footwork
Hand Usage
Highly Graded

Weaknesses:

Base
Run Game
Competition

Grade: Late Second/Early Third

68. Abraham Lucas

Washington State – OT #9

Abraham Lucas is more battle tested than most, with nearly 2,200 snaps under his belt. He played Right Tackle at Washington State, but has the potential to play on either side. Lucas is agile for an offensive lineman, and springs out of his release quickly. He is effective on screen passes, where he is able to get to the second level. Lucas has solid mirroring and moves his feet well. He's the opposite of a mauler, and allows edge rushers to attack him first. His base is still weak, and power rushers have been able to move him backwards. The passive nature at which Lucas plays Tackle with is not acceptable, and will be taken advantage of by top tier edge rushers. He was manhandled by Kayvon Thibodeaux, but fared well in his other games. Lucas has poor hand usage and technique, and improvement in that department may strengthen his anchor.

Playing at Washington State, Lucas rarely had the opportunity to run block, and when he did it wasn't anything worth translating to the NFL. His overall run blocking needs refinement, and should be his number one priority as a rookie. Lucas tested well at the combine, showing off his 5 flat 40 and scoring a 9.73 RAS (97%). Lucas and tackle Max Mitchell represent a debate amongst drafting lineman. Mitchell has the better technique and is more pro ready, but Lucas has the athleticism to impact the game more in the future. While Lucas has the traits to be a quality Tackle, he still has areas of improvement necessary for a starting role. He profiles as a rotational lineman day one, who can develop into a solid starter on the offensive line.

Strengths:

Agile
Mirroring
Release
Solid in Pass Pro

Weaknesses:

Passive
Base Run Blocking

Grade: Late Second/Early Third

69. Quay Walker

Georgia – LB #8

Quay Walker is the overlooked prospect from Georgia's star studded defense. His teammate Nakobe Dean was the center of attention for the linebacker corps, but Walker is not far behind as a prospect. Walker thrives in coverage, and is able to diagnose and access plays quickly. He has the speed to stay with receivers, and won't give up on routes. Dissimilar to most of the other linebacker prospects, Walker is skilled as a coverage defender, but doesn't offer much else. While Walker weighed in at around 240 lbs, his game style is far from physical. Offensive lineman bullied him at the point of contact, and he faced trouble fighting through blocks. Walker often loses balance when blitzing, and is far from a downhill runner. He is a strong tackler, but takes poor angles in pursuit. Walker has all the cerebral talent needed to play linebacker. He is rangy, but lacks the brute physicality that matches up against bruisers in the NFL. He's a safe prospect who can be easily slotted into most teams' systems. He lacks the high end and versatility to be an all around linebacker. Walker profiles as a smart coverage linebacker who has the potential to play MIKE.

Strengths:

Play Recognition
Solid in Coverage Fast Reaction Time

Weaknesses:

Inconsistent Angles
Bullied by Lineman
Struggles to Fight Through Blocks Poor Bitzer–Not a Downhill Runner

Grade: Late Second/Early Third

70. Matt Corral

Ole Miss – QB #6

Missing out on the pre draft process while recovering from an injury, Matt Corral has been flying under the radar as of late. Corral shares some characteristics with Zach Wilson that astonished scouts just a year ago. He has a quick release and puts plenty of zip on the football. He throws lasers downfield and has impressive arm strength. Corral has a good presence in the pocket and is able to escape rushers.

While Corral has some NFL traits, most of his game is tough to project to the NFL. He played in a heavy RPO offense, with around 36% of his plays in RPO. His offense allowed him to only focus on one receiver and he rarely had to read the whole field. Corral operates the quick game well, but struggles more on intermediate and deep passes. His game was focused around reading a single defender and zipping the ball in. Those offenses aren't around in the NFL, and Corral will have to read full defensive coverages. Corral is a fastball only passer and lacks passing nuance. He rarely throws with touch and is mostly one dimensional as a passer. His release point is high and could be lowered in the league. Corral was able to survive in the SEC with his legs, where he was bruised through defenders. His slender 6'2" 215 frame prevented that in the NFL. He won't be able to rely on his legs as often and will have to avoid hits.

Coming off a season ending ankle injury, Corral dealt with plenty of injuries in college. He is extremely skinny, leading to concerns over whether his body will be able to hold up in the NFL. Corral will need time and experience to adjust to the heavy differences in the NFL, and early injuries could alter that. While Corral has obvious arm talent and playmaking skills, his path from a gimmick college to running a full NFL playbook will be challenging. Matt Corral profiles as a high ceiling Quarterback with a low floor, who shouldn't start as a rookie.

Strengths:

Quick Release

Pocket Escapability

Zip on the Ball

Weaknesses:

Throwing with Touch

Injury History

Thin Frame

Little Experience Making Reads

Pro Comparison: Marcus Mariota – A slender athletic Quarterback who can make plays, but failed to grasp the entire scope of an NFL offense. He dealt with injuries and struggled to transition from a gimmicky college offense that perfectly fit his strengths.

Grade: Late Second/Early Third

71. Jalen Tolbert

South Alabama – WR #11

Jalen Tolbert is the perfect candidate to be this year's diamond in the rough Wide Receiver. He comes from a small school and is rarely talked about by the media, but has shown many ways to win at the position. Tolbert is a vertical threat who wins on the sideline. He attacks corners on deep routes, then breaks into comeback routes and wins there as well. Tolbert has special receiver instincts, knowing how to nuance his routes. He eats up space in a hurry, and loves to sell double moves. He's ultra twitchy, and plays an extra gear above his competition. Tolbert can be played both outside and in the slot. His pre-snap stance is awkward, but he has good footwork on his release. Tolbert thrived at the catch point, and awful Quarterback play forced him to adjust to passes.

While he has made various highlight reel catches, Tolbert dropped a good amount of balls. He dropped eight passes this year, which won't fly in the NFL. Tolbert has a thin and lanky frame, and could struggle to absorb NFL contact. While he has route running ability, Tolbert's also shown a lack of effort on many plays. The transition from South Alabama to a pro team will be challenging, and jogging during plays will be unacceptable.

While the competition at South Alabama was obviously poor, Tolbert proved he belonged amongst the rest at the Senior Bowl. Tolbert's final area of concern is his age. He will be 23 on draft day, and it will be harder for him to adjust his game as an older prospect. Tolbert's overall "receiver abilities" are encouraging, it's just the issues in his profile which scare teams away. If Tolbert can bulk up while maintaining his fluidity and vertical ability he will be a quality starting receiver. Tolbert is a rotational receiver in year one, with the potential to be a quality starting option.

Strengths:

Instincts
Vertical Threat
Twitchy
Catch Point

Weaknesses:

Frame
Competition
Age

Effort Concerns

Drops

Grade: Early Third/Late Second

72. Channing Tindall

Georgia – LB #9

Finally able to crack Georgia's rotation, Tindall showed off his crazy physicality. Tindall is a pure downhill runner, and is looking to smash anyone the ball. He can be used as a blitzer and play on the line of scrimmage. His tackling is amongst the best in the class, and he gives full effort on every attempt. Tindall is extremely athletic and fast, scoring a 9.86 RAS (98%) and a 4.47 40. His range allows him to QB spy on passing downs. While Tindall has awesome athletic traits and off-ball skills, his coverage is subpar. Tindall is jittery in coverage and lacks patience while waiting for plays to develop. While he has perfect blitzing traits, Tindall runs blind when heading downhill. He doesn't find gaps in the offensive line, instead running head on.

A good amount of Tindall's success this year can be attributed to the rest of Georgia's defense. Tindall only needed to cover for a few seconds, and was surrounded by two other top linebacker prospects. Tindall's game is more physical than cerebral, and Georgia's defense allowed him to mostly run free range. Tindall blitzed a third of his snaps and was used as a QB spy for many of the other plays. Even with a stacked Georgia crew, it's concerning that Tindall was more of a rotation player than a starter in the defense. Tindall is a good backup option for a team looking to draft Leo Chenal. Channing Tindall is a toolsy player who is most comparable to a wrecking ball. His physicality and athleticism offers upside in the passing game, but Tindall has a long way to go in that department. He profiles as an off-ball blitzer and QB spy, taking limited coverage snaps.

Strengths:

Speed

Downhill Runner

Athleticism

QB Spy

Weaknesses:

Jittery in Coverage

Rarely Plays Coverage

Barely Cracked Rotation

Poor IQ as a Blitzzer

Grade: Early Third

73. Roger McCreary

Auburn – CB #6

Roger McCreary has been one of the highest producing corners in college football. McCreary is the most physical corner in the class and doesn't give receivers any space. He's a pure man corner who gives full effort on every snap. McCreary has the swagger of a lockdown corner, talking trash after every stop. He has great ball skills, recording 28 pass breakups as a starter. He's extremely experienced against top college talent, producing in man coverage in nearly every game. McCreary won't be drafted to play zone coverage, not producing many impressive zone snaps at Auburn. He can lose sight of his receiver on multi-receiver routes, and was beaten on many crosser routes. He performed best on the sideline, where he is sticky and gets involved in each play.

Even with all his production at Auburn, McCreary has a glaring weakness that will cause many teams to take him off their draft boards. McCreary is only 5'11, but the main issue is his 28 inch arms. His arm length would be the smallest ever for an outside corner. His lack of length was apparent on tape, where he would whiff on press plays. With his lack of size you expect him to be an otherworldly athlete. However, McCreary was never known to have above average traits, and ran a mediocre 4.50 40 at the combine. His lack of speed forced him into situations where he was grabby and called for penalties and will only increase as a pro. McCreary's combination of average athleticism and limited length forced him to profile as a slot man corner in the NFL. I compared him to a discounted Jaycee Horn, as they both are extremely physical and sticky in man coverage. He can slide into the role as a rookie and has a high floor at the position. McCreary lacks the high end to guard top receivers, but will be a top tier corner three or slot option.

Strengths:

Aggressive

Ball Skills

Production on Sideline Plays

Experience

Weaknesses:

Insanely Short Arms

Grabby

Average Athlete

Zone Coverage

Midfield Routes

Grade: Early Third

74. Zyon McCollum

Sam Houston State – CB #7

A relatively unknown prospect, Zyon McCollum burst into the spotlight after his combine and pro day. McCollum is a small school player, whose tape was extremely difficult to find. He is the lone star from Sam Houston State, and his competition was levels below most players on this list. McCollum was matched up against Christian Watson and NDSU, and fared relatively well in that game. His technique is far less polished than the other rookie corners, but his coaching was nowhere near the Power 5 schools. NFL receivers can demolish McCollum from strictly a route running and nuance perspective. He will need time to develop, but McCollum has traits that no other Cornerback can offer. He is lanky and tall at 6'2, but is still more fluid than most other prospects.

McCollum had an all time NFL Combine, quite literally, posting the greatest score of any Cornerback ever (10 RAS). His testing was nearly perfect: elite 4.33 speed, explosive 40" vertical jump, and a 6.48 3-cone. Virtually all his numbers were in the 95+ percentile for Cornerbacks. McCollum has unteachable movement skills and change of direction, tools that most corners can only dream off. He was able to hang with top prospects at the Senior Bowl, and showed off passable technique for a rookie. The negative physical about Zyon are his 30.75 inch arms, which don't seem like such a concern. His tackling at Sam Houston State was quite good, and gives Zyon the ability to make an instant impact. Overall, Zyon is one of the biggest lottery picks in the draft. He has the potential to be one of the top corners in the league, but can also fail to ever earn reps. It all depends on coaching and whether Zyon has the work ethic to succeed. He profiles as a low rotational or bench corner, and an important developmental piece.

Strengths:

Frame

Athletic Traits

Tackling

Weaknesses:

Competition

Technique

Grade: Early Third

75. Calvin Austin III

Memphis – WR #12

Calvin Austin played both football and ran track at Memphis. He's the ideal shifty receiver, with the best change of direction in the class. His trackspeed shows on the field, and he is a true home run threat every time he touches the ball. His stop and go ability is phenomenal due to his outstanding body control. Unsurprisingly, Austin is an elite gadget player, and should be scripted touches behind the line. Austin isn't only limited to line of scrimmage action, and he has solid route running that he uses to win reps. His speed makes him a downfield threat, and Austin has very reliable hands.

Calvin Austin's downfall is his size, where he stands at a meager 5'8 170 lbs. He will struggle on the sideline against NFL athletes, and will be pigeonholed into the slot. A player of his stature is limited as an every down player, and is unable to be a true X receiver. However, Austin plays extra hard and bigger than he may appear. Austin adds punt and kick return ability which can secure him a spot on a roster. His 4.32 40 solidified his deep threat ability and proved Austin can be a field stretcher. Overall, Austin is a talented football player with top tier movement skills. He isn't your usual gadget and deep player, as he can run routes and adjust to catches. He offers value as an athletic slot option, who should be force fed touches behind the line as he adjusts to the NFL. Austin profiles as a gimmick WR 3 / 4, who will have a hard time in most systems, but can flourish on a team who can tap into his physical abilities.

Strengths:

Change of Direction

Speed

Body Control

Playmaking

Weaknesses:

Size

Wingspan

Possession Ability

Grade: Early/ Middle Third

76. Kyler Gordon

Washington – CB #7

Kyler Gordon is Washington's "other" Cornerback. He is aggressive and plays tight coverage, not allowing receivers any space. His hips are super fluid, allowing him to change direction at will. Gordon doesn't have elite speed, but possesses the short area quickness to make up for it. He's currently a primarily man corner, and has trouble covering in zone. Gordon's reaction time for routes is slow, and relies too much on his athleticism. His instincts in zone are lacking and he needs to speed up his processing. Part of Gordon's profile is his experience as the second corner. Gordon wasn't forced to lock down the other team's top receiver, and was able to mostly play the boundary.

Gordon was billed as an "athletic freak" but his combine performance didn't live up to the hype. His 3-Cone and Shuttle drills were as expected, but he ran a mediocre 4.52 40. He finished his pro day with an impressive 9.69 RAS, but it was mostly due to his explosive numbers in the broad and vertical jump. Gordon is an intriguing day two developmental pick. He profiles as a very good slot-man Cornerback, who can start there as a rookie. Gordon can also translate as a rotational corner who should play man packages. He has the movement skills to eventually be a high end CB2, but has to react better on the sidelines. Kyler Gordon is the perfect day two pick for any team looking for a developmental corner who can find a role as a rookie.

Strengths:

Fluid
Tight Coverage Quick

Weaknesses:

Reaction Time
Zone Instincts
Disappointing Testing

Grade: Middle Third

77. Coby Bryant

Cincinnati – CB #8

Cincinnati's second corner opposite Sauce Gardner, Coby Bryant presents a vastly different skill set. Bryant is instinctual with good ball skills. His receiver-like ball tracking allowed him to rack up ten interceptions and 37 pass deflections over his lengthy career. Bryant has average speed, but is balanced by his feel for zone coverage and good footwork. Tackling comes easy for Bryant, but he won't be a large factor in the run game. Bryant has average height and length for a corner, and his athleticism is underwhelming. His combine testing was poor, reflecting his tape. Bryant lacks top speed and can get burnt by speedsters. He plays man coverage like a zone player, watching the routes develop in front of him. He allowed plenty of comebacks routes, especially where receivers were able to find his blind spot. His hand usage and fluidity helps him keep up with receivers in short areas, but he was still beaten on breaking routes. He played more off man than press, giving up space to make up for his lack of speed. As the second corner, Bryant never had to guard top receivers, and was able to play zone coverage. He was able to play to his strengths at Cincinnati and will not get that luxury in the NFL. He lacks the traits to play elite man coverage, and should be drafted to play primarily zone coverage. Bryant has the instincts to play as a rookie, and profiles as a back end zone starter who can fill the stat sheet.

Strengths:

Ball Skills

Aggressive

Zone Instincts

Weaknesses:

Top Speed

Short Arms

Man coverage

Second Corner in College

Grade: Middle Third

78. Phidarian Mathis

Alabama – IDL #6

Phidarian Mathis has been a staple of Alabama's interior line. Mathis is an NFL ready Defensive Tackle with a low ceiling. In a class with elite interior athletes he's the odd one out, but may be the most technically sound of all of them. He has the power to drive lineman back, but isn't a pocket collapser. Mathis wins reps with his strong hands and usually resorts to his successful chop rush. He gets low and has a smart understanding of how to win leverage battles. Mathis is almost 24 and has been competing with prospects much younger than he is. His combine performance was disappointing and highlighted his average athleticism. He is tall with long arms, but lacks high end twitch or explosiveness. Phidarian Mathis will be an instant start on the interior, but will be nothing more than an average starter at best. Average Defensive Tackles struggle to make a large impact in the game and are usually just run stuffers and pocket pushers. Mathis will help stop the run and occasionally win pass rush reps, but don't expect him to take over the game.

Strengths:

Leverage

Hands

Power

Weaknesses:

Older

Average Traits

Upside

Grade: Middle Third

79. Tariq Woolen

UTSA – CB #9

Tariq Woolen is another product of Baylor's athletic powerhouse. He has ideal 6"4 205 size with lengthy 33.5 inch arms, already presenting a reason to be drafted. Woolen's game is built around his athleticism. He is fast in pursuit and can play the QB spy role. He is rangy and can make up ground in a hurry. Woolen has only two full years of Cornerback play under his belt, which shows in his newness to the position. He is slow to recognize plays, lacking any instincts whatsoever. Woolen whiffs on tackles and struggles to get off blocks. He doesn't turn to the ball, lacking any sense of ball skills. While he moves fast, his hips are clunky in coverage.

As a pure project player, Woolen had a lot to prove at the combine. He completely smashed all expectations, and solidified himself as a top athlete in the class. While his poor 3-Cone and Shuttle numbers reflected his clunky change of direction skills, the rest of his performance was historic. Woolen testing wasn't only outrageous for a 6"4 Cornerback, it would've been an all timer for any player at any position. He ran a 4.26 40, jumped 42" in the vertical, and nearly 11 feet in the broad. Scouts are enamored with his uncoachability, speed, burst and explosiveness, and it's hard to argue. Woolen is practically a blank slate at Cornerback, giving coaches infinite tools to work with. He has far to go in terms of his feel at the position, and teams are betting on his coachability and work ethic. Woolen is a developmental player who won't start as a rookie. Woolen profiles as a long term answer at Cornerback with infinite potential. His athleticism gives him the versatility to play outside or even at Safety. He may fail to ever see the field, but is worth the risk given his ceiling and limited experience.

Strengths:

Length

Versatility

Athletic Traits

New To Position

Weaknesses:

Passive

Coverage Instincts

Tackling Technique

Grade: Third Round

80. Tyler Smith

Tulsa – OT #9

While Tyler Smith has been rising up big boards, even making appearances in the first round, I'm more hesitant on the Tulsa lineman. He has appealing size at the position, at a burly 325 lbs. He manages to play even stronger than his size, shoving defenders left and right. Smith drives his legs while in contact, and wins most battles once locked in. His power is evident, and Tyler Smith's speed adds another level of alluring athleticism. On the surface, Tyler Smith seems like an ideal mauler at tackle, who consistently wins with explosive power. However, Smith struggles to convert athleticism to technique, and struggles in pass sets. Smith's release needs a complete overhaul. He has a short kickback, and doesn't cover much ground in his pass sets. His feet are stiff and all over the place. Smith strikes the defenders pads too high, and oftentimes overextends his arms. His pass sets overall are clunky, and coaches will need to fully develop his game. Smith was penalized with 13 holding calls last season and will rack them up as a rookie. His competition at Tulsa was lackluster, and he was able to survive on pure athleticism.

Tyler Smith is one of the youngest players at 21, giving a lot of traits for teams to work with. Smith played little snaps in the run game, and will have to improve his technique there as well. While I'm lower on Tyler Smith than most, I believe he's a solid day two project tackle with a high ceiling. He offers high end traits and aggression that can grow into elite play. However, he isn't an immediate fix at the position and is too high risk to be a first round prospect. Tyler Smith profiles as a developmental tackle on either side who shouldn't see the field as a rookie.

Strengths:

Frame Finisher Power Mauler

Weaknesses:

Clunky Feet
Hand Placement
Release

Grade: Middle/Late Third

81. Cam Jurgens

Nebraska – IOL #7

Another draft season riser, Cam Jurgens offers many traits to be excited by. His technique is still very raw and has room for plenty of growth. Jurgens has inconsistent hand placement, oftentimes striking too high on a defender. Even with 2,000 snaps under his belt, Jurgens still makes mental mistakes. He can miss blitzers and whiff completely on blocks. Jurgens is smaller for a Center at 303 lbs, but is a tremendous athlete. His agility and speed are off the charts, running a 4.92 40 with an explosive 1.71 10-Split.

His combine was an overall masterpiece, with elite jumping and change of direction testing as well. Jurgens ended off the weekend with a 9.94 RAS, in the 99% for all Centers. His physical traits showed up on tape, where he got to the second level quickly. He thrived in zone run concepts, and can run stunts and movement blocks. Jurgens is aggressive and finishes blocks. Cam Jurgens is the perfect developmental Center for a Shanahan style offense. He will have rookie flaws, but Jurgens projects as a developmental zone blocking Center who can play snaps year one.

Strengths:

Zone Run Blocking
Getting to the Second Level
Athletic Traits

Weaknesses:

Hand Placement
Inconsistent Technique Smaller Center

Grade: Middle/Late Third

82. James Cook

Georgia – RB #3

James Cook is no longer just the younger brother of Pro-Bowler Dalvin Cook. He split carries at Georgia this season, and was used as the home run threat. Cook is as shifty as it gets, and has a complete juke package. Cook knows how to get to open field, and is in his element once he gets there. A big play threat, Cook has the ability to score every carry he gets. He can line out wide, and has secure hands. His pass protection is solid, but nothing to write home about.

With all the similarities to Dalvin, James Cook's obvious difference is his build. Cook is a slender 5'11 200 lbs, allowing defenders to knock him off balance. He won't power through tackles, and goes down quite easily. His big play ability is a blessing and a curse, as it can seem that he either gains 20 yards or none. Cook was given limited carries at Georgia, and might struggle to absorb NFL hits. He has the skillset to be an every down back if his body is able to hold up. Cook was able to bulk up for his combine while still testing athletically. If he can continue to do so, James Cook can be a successful all around Runningback. If Cook struggles to maintain a heavy workload, he can impact the game as a third down back.

Strengths:

Shifty

Receiving Ability

Gets to Open Field

Big Play Threat

Weaknesses:

Slender

Balance

Consistent Yardage

Workload

Grade: Middle/Late Third

83. Rasheed Walker

Penn State – OT #11

A former five star recruit, Rasheed Walker has been falling down draft boards due to injury. His injury forced him to miss out on the combine and pro-day, so scouts will have to strictly rely on his tape. Walker has good size for a Tackle at 6'6 313. Walker's technique is the definition of passable, he isn't a liability in any sense, but has few refined elite abilities. He has a good release, but can still be beaten on the edge by speed rushers. Walker covers ground, but needs to improve his kickback. His base isn't a concern, but Walker is able to be bull rushed by elite power rushers. Walker's best asset are his strong hands, which are equipped with counters. However, he has the tendency to overextend his arms, which leads to rushers gaining leverage. Walker's biggest issue is his balance, and allowed rushers to knock him off his feet. While he didn't test athletically, Walker displayed NFL athleticism. He's not a flashy pick, but Rasheed Walker profiles as a rotational tackle as a rookie, who can grow into a solid starting tackle.

Strengths:

Base

Release

Passable Technique

Weaknesses:

Kickback

Balance

Beat on Outside

Grade: Third Round

84. Sam Williams

Ole Miss – Edge #15

Sam Williams wins with his speed. He has a quick get off, and is relentless around the edge. His high motor is evident, and Williams will clean up plays on the back end. He possesses strong hands which he uses to chop block linemen. While he is on the lighter side for edge rushers, Williams has a strong NFL build. Williams doesn't win with any sort of bull rush, and was pushed around too often by linemen. He lacks a true pass rush arsenal, giving him the opportunity to develop his game. Winning primarily on athleticism, Williams still managed to produce as a rusher, recording 4+ pressures in almost every game. He won't offer much in the run game, but puts in the effort to make an impact. Williams occasionally dropped back into coverage, giving coaches the ability to creatively situate him.

Sam Williams impressed at the Combine, running a speedy 4.46 40. He performed all around, earning a 9.72 RAS (97%). With his athleticism and motor, Williams has the look of an NFL player. He needs to improve his down to down consistency, and develop moves as a pass rusher. Williams profiles as a rotational rusher as a rookie, who is best used on third downs. He has the potential to be an above average pass rusher who can win in many ways.

Strengths:

Speed

Strong Hands

Motor

Weaknesses:

Pass Rush Arsenal

Pushed Around

Grade: Third Round

85. Brian Asamoah

Oklahoma – LB #10

Brian Asamoah improved heavily this year at Oklahoma. He is rangy and can cover ground in a hurry. Asamoah is quick to the ball and loves to make plays. He is a good tackler, and excels at tracking down Running Backs. Asamoah is undersized, standing at 6'0 226 lbs. His small frame limits him from guarding Tight Ends, and allows him to get pushed around by linemen. While he thrives in run defense, Asamoah is unpolished in pass coverage. He is passive in coverage, often watching the play instead of acting. His instincts need work, and Asamoah can get lost on routes. He has the range to improve in coverage, but lacks the size to cover every player.

Asamoah is best utilized as a run stopper, who is given free range to make tackles all over the field. In a league increasingly running more zone concepts, Asamoah has the skills to defend outside runs. Brian Asamoah profiles as a WILL Linebacker, where he can make plays without having to rely on his coverage abilities. Asamoah's role as an off-ball Linebacker is devalued, lowering his draft stock further than his skill level. His run defense gives him a solid floor to contribute as a rookie, but his size limits him from being a true Middle Linebacker.

Strengths:

Rangy

Attack the Ball
Tackling

Weaknesses:

Small
Can't Guard TE's Watches Pass Plays
Coverage Instincts

Grade: Third Round

86. Drake Jackson

USC – Edge #14

Drake Jackson was an expected first rounder this year, whose career has become more uncertain. He is a pure project at Edge, who just recently turned 21. Jackson is a bulkier edge at 6"3 254 lbs. Jackson attempted to win purely based on athletic traits, which will fail in the NFL. He has a slow get off and lacks explosiveness. Jackson rarely uses his hands, possessing little to no counters. With few moves in his arsenal, Drake plays with no pass rush plan whatsoever. His method of winning reps is simply trying to out muscle his way to the Quarterback. Whoever drafts Jackson will need to completely develop his pass rush skills. He lacks pure lower body strength to out muscle most NFL linemen. He added very little in the run game, with only 10 stops all season. Jackson has a NFL worthy frame, but that's pretty much all he has at the moment. He is still super young with plenty of time to refine himself as a pass rusher. Jackson profiles as a developmental edge who should rarely see the field as a rookie. He has the build to be a productive pass rusher who can be moved around the line.

Strengths:

Frame
Age
Length

Weaknesses:

Get Off

Hand Usage

Pass Rush Plan

Grade: Third

87. Kellen Diesch

Arizona State – OT #12

Kellen Diesch is a safe selection in the back end of day two. A 6th year senior, Diesch played Left Tackle at Arizona State. Similar to most older prospects, Diesch's technique is impressively polished. His footwork is sound, allowing him to mirror well. While his hands lack punch, Diesch has precise hand placement. Diesch is a smart blocker, who plays with technicality and consistency. Diesch is a tall 6'7", but is extremely light at only 300 lbs. His arms are only 32 inches, rounding out an overall weak frame and length profile. Transferring after his Senior year, Diesch was only able to secure a starting role as a 5th year senior.

Diesch will turn 25 by his rookie debut, so what you get now with Diesch is likely what he will be throughout his career. Kellen Diesch is a fluid mover, and surprisingly lit up the NFL combine. He recorded the fastest 40 time for any lineman this year at 4.89, while also running the Shuttle in only 4.43 seconds. His jumping drills were also phenomenal, resulting in a 9.75 RAS (97%). Diesch's combine testing gives him an athletic profile, but doesn't ignore his glaring weight concerns. In order to ever lock down a starter role, Diesch must put on weight. His base will get exposed by power rushers who can bull rush the daylight out of him. Diesch lacks an elite ceiling, but is a smart pickup for any team looking to add a rotational lineman. He will never be the best athlete on the field, and will lose reps against top tier Edge Rushers. Diesch has a high floor and can slide in as a rookie if he is able to bulk up.

Strengths:

Footwork

Mirroring
Technicall
Smart Consistent

Weaknesses:

Arm Length
25 as a Rookie Light

Grade: Third Round

88. Myjai Sanders

Cincinnati – Edge #15

Myjai Sanders returned to Cincinnati this year with the hopes of bringing home a championship. Sanders unfortunately fell short of his goal, but not before helping the Bearcats reach their first ever playoff berth. Myjai has an unusually lanky build, with a build closer to a receiver than most outside rushers. He has long arms which he uses to separate himself from linemen. Myjai rushes with both speed and patience, bursting off the line before planning his rush. His bend is solid, giving Myjai the tools to win around the edge. Myjai's speed offers an added bonus in stopping outside run plays, where he can quickly run horizontally.

Most of Myjai's issues stem from his light frame. He was often overpowered by linemen, a concern that will only increase when facing NFL Tackles. Myjai struggles to stay on his feet, ending up on the ground nearly every other play. His balance is incredibly concerning, and may lead to injuries in the future. Myjai has few moves, and won't consistently win with his pass rush arsenal. His competition level at Cincinnati was weak for most of the season, and getting physically manhandled by non Power-5 Tackles only raises red flags. Sanders seemed to be contained more often than other top Edge prospects, showing that he has plenty of room to grow as a rusher.

To say the least, Myjai's Combine weekend was perplexing. He reportedly dealt with a sickness prior to the event, then showed up at a 0th percentile 228 lbs, a weight which is virtually unplayable. Teams must hope that his awkward testing was a fluke due to his recovery. Even as a senior, Myjai Sanders is a pure project Edge who must bulk up to stay on the field. His long arms and quickness are intriguing, along with potential in the run game. Myjai Sanders will face a steep learning curve, and his coaches will need to plan out a way for him to see the field.

Strengths:

Long Arms
Speed
Run Game Potential Patience Bend

Weaknesses:

Balance
Pushed Around Weight – Overpowered Competition
Senior

Grade: Third Round

89. Kerby Joseph

Illinois – S #6

Following three years of special teams play, Kerby Joseph got his chance at Safety this season. He is an ideal 6'1 203 lbs with lengthy 33" arms. At the moment, Kerby is mostly just an athlete at the position. He's incredibly fluid as a runner and is super comfortable moving around the field. Joseph may have the best ball skills in the class, with the ability to contort his body and adjust to catches. He recorded five interceptions and four pass breakups this season. With plenty of experience in special teams, Kerby can add value as a Gunner. His special teams ability will help him stick onto a roster. Kerby's Gunner ability translates to his ability to tackle in open field.

Kerby is new to the position, and lacks the instincts and nuance to play Safety. He is still learning how to read and understand coverages, which is not the type of player you want anchoring your defense as a rookie. Kerby is slow to react to plays, as Safety is not yet second nature to him. While he's incredibly fluid, Joseph lacks elite speed for a single high. It's concerning that Kerby Joseph wasn't able to win reps until his senior year, especially on a struggling Syracuse team. Kerby played primarily deep coverage, which is where he projects in the NFL. He is new to the position and it shows, but Joseph has the fluidity and length to develop into a starting Safety with experience and proper coaching. Kerby profiles as a rotational rookie who can develop into a long term deep Safety.

Strengths:

Ball Skills

Fluid

Special Teams Gunner

Size and Length

Weaknesses:

Elite Speed

Understanding Coverages

New to Safety

Grade: Third Round

90. Kaiir Elam

Florida – CB #11

Kaiir Elam broke out as a sophomore at Florida, with expectations of a top corner in college. His draft projection reached as high as the first round, but I see him more worthy of a late day two selection. Elam is battle tested at Cornerback, facing many of the top receivers in this class. He presses well on the line and is aggressive with his opponents. Elam has fluid hips which helps him stick to receivers in man coverage. He has solid size and length, and ran a blazing 4.39 at the Combine. While he is not there yet, Elam's speed gives him a ceiling of an island corner. However, Elam has a few glaring weaknesses that will hinder his ability to stay on the field. To put it lightly, Elam's tackling is horrendous. He gets caught on blocks, and struggles to make any open field tackle. Even in tight spaces, Elam lacked technique and missed plenty of tackles at Florida. Receivers with any YAC ability will feed on Elam after the catch. Elam's other red flag is quite literally flags. He was flagged seven times in only ten games last year. His man ability relies on putting his hands on receivers, which will get called in the NFL.

Elam has the experience and movement skills to thrive as a press-man corner in the future. However, it may be difficult for him to loosen up on his handsy coverage while maintaining “stickiness” in man. Elam dealt with injuries in college, which can hinder his play in the NFL. His regression from sophomore to junior year at Florida was only slight, but did not reflect the upward trend you hope to see from a prospect. Elam profiles as a incontinent rookie, with high end plays and plenty of mishaps. He is best used in off or press man coverage.

Strengths:

Stingy Coverage

Solid in Man

Fluid

Battle Tested

Weaknesses:

Horrible Tackler

Penalties

Injuries

Grade: Third Round

91. Josh Paschal

Kentucky – Edge #16

Josh Paschal differs from most other edge rushers in the class. While these Edge players are long and tall, Paschal is built like a bowling ball. He weighs 270 lbs at only 6’3. His compact build lends him elite lower body strength, which Paschal uses to bull rush defenders. Paschal has a powerful release and shoots gaps. He thrives in the run game, where his low center of gravity and power rush allows him to explode blockers. Paschal has a high motor and will get to the outside on zone run plays. He can be moved inside and play the middle of the field.

Paschal’s unique skillset can help him plug holes in a defense, but he lacks the Edge makeup that coaches will prefer. He lacks length, and can’t use his arms to separate himself. Paschal has limited bend and will struggle to win outside. He has few pass rush moves, and his bull rush will be less effective against NFL athletes. Paschal has no trump card to consistently win pass rush reps. He isn't going to rush the passer at an elite level, lowering his value as an Edge Rusher. Paschall profiles as a versatile run defender who can collapse a pocket, and will primarily play on early downs.

Strengths:

Run Defense

Motor

Power

Bull Rush

Weaknesses:

Length

Pass Rush Moves

No Real Way to Win

Grade: Third Round

92. Luke Goedeke

Central Michigan – IOL #8

Following an ACL tear that sidelined him the entire 2021 season, Luke Goedeke returned in full fashion to play Right Tackle for Central Michigan. Goedeke stands at a large 6'5" 313 lbs. He wins contact battles and can stand his ground against power rushers. Goedeke aggressively locks in with edge rushers, and rarely loses once he grabs hold of them. He has a good release and relatively polished footwork. Goedeke isn't racking up highlight level blocks, but he is consistent in his reps. He lacks the quickness of a Tackle and was beaten around the edge. He has short 32¼ " arms that move him inside. Goedeke can win in a phone booth as a guard, which plays perfectly to his strengths.

Coming from Central Michigan, Goedeke played against weak competition, so his jump to larger NFL defenders may take some time. A big concern with Goedeke is his health. He was injured once again this year with his hamstring, which puts his overall ability to stay healthy in jeopardy. Goedecke lacks the high ceiling of a first round player, but is a perfect plug and play Guard that can help out immediately. If he can stay healthy, there's no reason Goedecke won't be a consistent player on the interior.

Strengths:

Frame

Stands His Ground

Technical Consistency

Hand Usage

Weaknesses:

Arm Length

Pure Guard in NFL

Competition

Injury Concerns

Grade: Third Round

93. Amaré Barno

Virginia Tech – Edge #17

Amaré Barno is an extremely unique Edge prospect. He went largely under the radar before exploding at the Combine. Barno ran a 4.36 40 yard dash, the fastest for any Defensive End in NFL history. He also weighed in at 246 lbs at 6"5, questioning his ability to fit into any role as an Edge. His 34" arms present a long frame to grow into. Barno is explosive off the line with a quick get off. He has a high motor and is relentless in his pass rush. Most of Barno's strengths are untraditional for his position. He is lightning quick in pursuit, with the speed to drop back into coverage. Barno is excellent as a QB spy. He lacks a true pass rush skillset, possessing little to no moves. His slender frame allows lineman to stop him in his tracks. NFL Tackles will bottle him up as a rookie. Any team looking to draft Barno must have a use for him. He is versatile and can be moved around, but lacks a true position. A raw player with size concerns, Barno profiles as a developmental hybrid DE/LB. If creatively used, Barno can be an elite run defender who can add value on speed downs.

Strengths:

Speed

Versatility to Drop Back

QB Spy

Motor

Pursuit

Weaknesses:

Size

Raw

Gets Bottled Up

Lacks a True Role

Grade: Third Round

94. Damone Clark

LSU – LB #11

Damone Clark's career fully rests on his injury status. At the combine Clark was found with a herniated disc and will undergo spinal surgery. He will miss at least his rookie year, and it could jeopardize his entire career. I'm no medical expert, so my grade is purely film based, but Clark should fall well into day three. Clark has an ideal Linebacker build with long 33" arms. He's a fluid runner who performs in pursuit. Clark is a leg tackler who occasionally whiffs on tackles. His coverage skills aren't anything exciting, but is relatively safe. He allows the underneath pass, going for the tackle not the deflection. Clark should show curiosity more often, and avoid acting timid in coverage. His reaction time is slow and can improve at the next level. Clark isn't always running full speed, which needs to change in the NFL. Similarly to his tape, Clark's performance at the Combine was impressive, but nothing supernatural. Damone Clark is far from flashy, but has a relatively well rounded game. He won't be the focal point of a defense, but can plug its holes. Barring long term injury, Clark profiles as a rotational linebacker who can add depth to the Linebacker position as a rookie.

Strengths:

Good Angles
Safety in Coverage Rarely Beaten NFL Ready

Weaknesses:

Spinal Injury
Average Athlete
Lacks Aggression
Allows underneath passes
Not Always Running Lacks High Ceiling

Grade: Late Third

95. Isaiah Likely

Coastal Carolina – TE #3

Isaiah Likely was the focal point of Coastal Carolina's offense. He caught 12 touchdowns to go along with over 900 yards. He moves like a bigger Wide Receiver and has elite ball skills for a Tight End. Likely has great route running and absorbs contact. He has the speed to outrun linebackers, and possesses YAC ability. While Likely is too small to truly make an impact as a blocker, he puts in the effort to succeed. Likely is uber talented for a Tight End, but has size closer to a puffed up Wide Receiver. At 6'5 245 lbs, Likely has been labeled as a tweener, and it will be tough for him to grow out of that. He's too big and clunky to be used as a pure receiver, but lacks the size and blocking for a Tight End. Likely is athletic and has noticeable talent, but must either slim down or bulk up in order to find himself a true role. He profiles as a TE #2, or can be given a specialized role based around his unique size and skillset.

Strengths:

Movement Skills
Speed

Route Running
Ball Skills

Weaknesses:

Tweener
Small for TE Clunky for WR

Grade: Early Fourth

96. David Bell

Purdue – WR #14

David Bell produced as one of the top Wide Receivers in college. He was a bonafide stud at Purdue, tearing up some of the top teams in college football. He is a shorter receiver at 6'1, with a strong lower body. Bell has incredible receiver instincts. He uses his body well to shield defenders away, and has great hands. His ball instincts are amongst the best and catching the ball comes super naturally. The concerns about Bell are over how well his game will translate to the NFL. His testing at the Combine was extremely underwhelming, testing as a 40% (4.03 RAS) athlete with a 4.56 40 Yard Dash. Bell lacks explosiveness and will struggle to separate in the NFL. He won't be able to rely on contested catches like he did in the NFL. Bell is a pure possession receiver who won't take the top off a defense. He has solid YAC and can break tackles. Bell is capped by his below average athleticism. He profiles as an average slot option who is relatively pro ready.

Strengths:

Lower Body Strength
Instincts
Hands

Weaknesses:

Explosiveness
High End Traits
Separation

Grade: Late Third/Early Fourth

97. John Metchie III

Alabama – WR #13

A product of the Peddie School in New Jersey, Metchie has been a staple of Alabama's offense. He wins with nuanced route running, with the instincts of a seasoned pro. His release is diverse and is best played in off coverage. Metchie is relatively pro ready, and can fit into an offense as a rookie. Metchie offers very little upside at receiver. He has a small frame, and is below average athletically. Metchie won't take the top off an offense, and doesn't possess much YAC. Physical Cornerbacks will push him around and not let him get to his spots. He had eight drops this season, so Metchie may need extra time at the jugs machine this offseason. Metchie tore his ACL during the CFB playoffs, so recovering to full strength should be his number one priority. John Metchie is an easier projection to the NFL. He profiles as a slot receiver who can produce as a rookie, but only has the ceiling of an average #2 receiver.

Strengths:

Release

Route Running

IQ

Weaknesses:

Frame

Athleticism

Elite Potential

ACL Injury

Drops

Grade: Early Fourth

98. Marcus Jones

Houston – CB #12

Marcus Jones will have no trouble sticking on an NFL roster. He was the top kick/punt returner in college, and will instantly impact special teams play. Jones is insanely fluid and has superhuman body control. He is speedy and won't be beat by faster gadget receivers. Jones has one obvious red flag which is his size. Marcus Jones is only 5'8, completely limiting his role as a Cornerback. He will struggle to guard outside receivers, and will be boxed into a slot role. Even as a slot player, Jones will still be incredibly small. He is aggressive and gives receivers as little space as possible. Jones is a 5th year senior and one of the older prospects in the draft. Marcus Jones is a good football player and athlete. However, his size is a massive red flag which ultimately places Jones as a primarily special teams player. When played at Corner, Jones is best used in the slot where he can rely on his absurd movement skills.

Strengths:

Quick
Stingy Coverage
Special Teams

Weaknesses:

Size
Older Prospect

Grade: Early Fourth

99. Cole Strange

Chattanooga – IOL #9

Cole Strange was largely under the radar before shooting up the last few months. He has an explosive release and covers ground extremely fast. Strange attacks defenders and is the first to make contact. His athleticism is special, allowing Strange to win phone booth battles with defenders. Strange is far from a polished prospect. He gets caught off balance and can miss blocks. Strange plays uncomfortable, and needs to continue his upward trend as a player.

He was spectacular at the combine, moving extremely well and exploding through the drills. He left Indiana having proven his elite traits and athleticism (9.95 RAS). While Strange clearly has the ability to grow as a player, he will be 24 as a rookie with far less time to improve. He played weak competition at Chattanooga, and his pure strength will be tested in the NFL.

Cole Strange is a perfect developmental Guard or Center for a zone run scheme. He can get to the second level and pop off the line of scrimmage. Strange has the size to start day one, with the potential to be a long term starter on the interior.

Strengths:

Aggressive

Explosive

Athleticism

Weaknesses:

Polished Technique

Age

Competition

Grade: Early Fourth

100. Zach Tom

Wake Forest – OT #13

A three year starter from Wake Forest, Zach Tom has improved every year in college. His calling card is pass blocking, and he's more technical than many of the Tackles above him. He has good footwork and has great mirroring ability. Tom will ride with rushers before locking them in with his strong arms. Wake Forest was a pass heavy offense, yet Tom rarely allowed pressures. Zach picks up blitzers and rotates with stunts. He has the polish to slide in at tackle as a rookie. However, Zach Tom has physical limitations that weaken his ability to block talented edge rushers. He's only 6'4" 300 lbs, and barely passes the 33" arm length barrier. Longer rushers can separate with their length, rendering Zach's technique irrelevant. His anchor is concerning and he was plowed backwards too often in college. Bull rushers will give Zach problems as he adjusts to NFL strength. His run game isn't a liability, but Zach isn't a mover and just stands his ground.

He exploded at the Combine, running a 4.94 40 and jumping out the building. His testing (9.59 RAS) is what you hope for from a player of his stature. Zach Tom has the movement skills to improve in the run game and win battles on the edge. His problem in pass rush isn't defenders going around him, it's the defenders who can go through Zach. Zach's ceiling is limited by his anchor and frame, but he can fill in as a solid pass protector up front. He has very few technical flaws and won't make a ton of mistakes in pass pro.

Strengths:

Hand Usage
Footwork
Mirroring
Picking up Blitzers

Weaknesses:

Anchor
Length
Not a Mauler

Grade: Early Fourth

Just Missed the Cut:

J.T. Woods (S, Baylor) – Athletic safety but lacks physicality and size.

Cam Taylor-Britt (CB, Nebraska) - Physical twitchy Cornerback who has a tendency to get burnt.

Greg Dulcich (TE, UCLA) - Natural receiver who can play in a modern receiver but needs to add weight.

Nick Cross (S, Maryland) - Deep playmaker who is still learning the nuances of the position.

Dohnovan West (IOL, Arizona State) - Young developmental guard who packs explosivity.

Acknowledgements –

Big thanks to RASFootball, PFF, DraftNetwork and MockDraftDatabase for the stats and measurements. Shoutout to the MDM crew for another year of mock drafting. Couldn't have finished this without DMess saving the day with the formatting and fonts. A final thanks to Bennett for the usual dueling mock drafts. 2023 draft guide will be on another level

- Mister Irrelevant

Twitter Instagram Website
